Lorimar/K&E: Total communications vision brings forth 'daring' merger

By CHRISTY MARSHALL and MORRIE GELMAN

Lorimar Productions' giant step from Hollywood to Madison Avenue, with its proposed acquisition of Kenyon & Eckhardt, could send lasting reverberations through the advertising industry.

By week's end, the surprise generated by the independent tv/movie production company's announcement that it plans to buy the country's 24th-largest advertising agency seemed to be giving way to growing appreciation of the virtues of the specific agreement—and its possible broader implications.

Leo-Arthur Kelmenson, K&E chief executive officer, said the agreement, if completed as expected on June 30, will mark the formation of a "total communications company" that will serve as a model for other such combinations. "I promise you in five years you are going to see eight of these kinds of situations in the business," he said.

"In effect, [the agreement] gets the agencies and their advertisers back into the television business," said Warren V. Bush, an independent tv producer. He described the move as "excellent and shrewd."

Barbara Brogliatti, a senior vp at Embassy Communications, another major independent production company, called the merger "a good idea" because it puts expertise in two different media fields under one roof. She called the idea "exciting" and "very daring."

It also may be a strategically appropriate move for an advertising community trying to come to grips with the rapid changes in video technology.

"I think ad agencies are going to be back in television production in a big way," said Lee Rich, Lorimar president and a former media and programing executive with Benton & Bowles. "I think their clients are going to demand it. I think with the new areas that are open—cable and pay [tv] and all the other things—the clients are going to say, 'Hey I want to do my own thing, and I want to do it less expensively than buying it.' "

Although there have been numerous agency acquisitions in recent years, nearly all of them have been made by larger agencies. K&E would be one of the largest agencies to be acquired by a nonagency, topped in recent years only by Cunningham & Walsh's acquisition by Mickleberry Corp. in 1982. But the Lorimar deal clearly would be more significant, industry followers say, because its business so closely complements the advertising business.

Principals in the agreement gushed about the "synergism" and competitive edge to be gained when the two companies are merged, ranging from the injection of Lorimar's production expertise into K&E's creative efforts to the subtle, or perhaps not so subtle, showing of the products of K&E clients in Lorimar's tv shows and movies.

"We think the ability to cross-pollinate our

CBS predicts win despite hot 'Birds'

By DIANE MERMIGAS

Despite ABC's last-ditch effort to win the tv season with special programing like "The Thorn Birds," which gave rise to sticky new problems for the network last week, CBS is predicting it will finish victorious in mid-April—a mere half of one ratings point ahead of its competitor.

"In order for ABC to beat or to tie us," said CBS Broadcast Group research vp David Poltrack, "it would have to lead CBS by seven and one-half ratings points each of the remaining three weeks of the season. . .One week of 'The Thorn Birds' isn't going to do it for them. We estimate we'll win the prime time season by half a ratings point. Last season, we won by nine-tenths of a ratings point."

"Thorn Birds," a 10-hour, four-night adaptation of Colleen McCullough's best seller, which premiered on Palm Sunday, came under fire last week by the U.S. Catholic Conference, which called the network's scheduling of the drama during Holy Week "an affront to good taste and religious sensibilities."

The conference, which represents the nation's Roman Catholic bishops, said it was not taking exception to the network's production, only to the placement of a story which "uses the church in a melodramatic and insensitive fashion" in chronicling the "adulterous conduct of a churchman."

A spokesman said the conference was not attempting to pressure advertisers to withdraw

7-11 gets locations via Citgo

By TOM BAYER

DALLAS—With site selection one of the keys to success in the convenience-store industry, Southland Corp.'s agreement to acquire the refining, marketing and transportation businesses of Cities Service Co., Tulsa, would give it ready access to 611 Citgo service stations and 350 Quik Mart locations.

Southland's 7-Eleven chain already has 7,257 locations, and continues to shift and relocate stores to more visible and profitable corner sites from less advantageous ones.

The company said the Cities Service retail outlets would continue to be operated under those names. But Southland is known to be trying every imaginable angle to hone its competitive edge against the wide variety of fast-food, gasoline and other retailers that have cropped up as stiff competitors for the nation's No. 1 convenience-store chain.

Already the nation's largest independent gasoline retailer, 7-Eleven—with Cities Service—would substantially increase its access to gasoline supplies on most favorable terms.

The Cities Service refinery complex is the ninth-largest in the U.S., and among the most technologically sophisticated, Southland said. And the deal also includes a 65% interest in a lubricant oil refinery in the Lake Charles, La., refinery complex.

The $567 million transaction, subject to a definitive agreement and necessary approvals, would give Cities Service parent Occidental Petroleum, Los Angeles, 20% of Southland's stock and put Occidental chairman Armand Hammer on the Southland board.#

'Play ball' now means marketing hard-ball

Baseball readies pitch

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

As Major League Baseball's 26 teams prepare to put their promotional and advertising machines in gear for the season kickoff next week, all eyes are on Oakland, where the Athletics will make the transition to life without "Billyball."

Over the last two years, according to marketing people with both American and National League teams, the A's have changed—some said revolutionized—the way baseball is sold to the public. If the A's succeed at the gate this season without their former manager Billy Martin, the team's breakthrough marketing and advertising—a slick, humor-filled, heavily advertised and promoted package—will be adopted by other clubs, at least in part. If the A's formula does not succeed, the other teams will think twice about using it, probably sticking with the traditional low-key approach.

The A's ads, which were built around the fiery manager's personality by agency Ogilvy & Mather, made "Billyball" a symbol of aggressive, derring-do baseball. Mr. Martin is now managing the New York Yankees, for the third time.

The Yankees, which under the George Steinbrenner regime have let turmoil and tradition do the marketing for them, are taking advantage of that campaign's fame with a "Billy's Back" campaign. It features t-shirts, outdoor boards and an uncharacteristic preseason tv spot for the club that shows clips of Billy Martin in action—kicking dirt, gesticulating, as he takes on the umpires. During Mr. Martin's first two stints with the Yankees, he was not used in any preseason advertising. However, the Yankees rarely have used tv advertising before the season.

As baseball marketers wonder what will happen in a Billy-less Oakland, they also face a new competitor, the U.S. Football League. But that fact will not cause them to alter existing marketing plans. "We really are not structuring anything different because of the competition of the USFL," said Denny Lehman, marketing director of the Philadelphia Phillies. "Obviously, the sports dollar is going to be eroded slightly, but that erosion

Beech-Nut brings European baby-food formula to U.S.

By NANCY GIGES

Beech-Nut Nutrition Co. says it will revolutionize the baby food business in the U.S. with new Beech-Nut Stages, a line of 120 fruits, vegetables, dinners and soups drawing on parent company Nestle's experience overseas.

The sequential feeding approach to marketing baby food, which would replace traditional strained and junior formulas, has been successful in Europe, according to Niels Hoyvald, Beech-Nut president. Nestle and other European companies have sold baby food this way for years, he noted.

The executive pointed out that Beech-Nut has been working for more than two years to develop appealing nutritional foods that contain no preservatives and no added salt or sugar.

Fort Washington, Pa.-based Beech-Nut is testing the line in northern and central Florida, including Orlando (AA, March 21), backed with an $8 million spending rate for Stages and a separate $11 million rate for Table Time, which is actually Stage 4 in the feeding program. Sherwood & Schneider, a subsidiary of Della Femina, Travisano & Partners, is the agency.

Products are color-coded and designated as appropriate for one of four stages in a baby's early months. Stage One, with a red label, is made up of single-ingredient products, such as applesauce and carrots, for very young babies. Stage Two, coded blue, is made up of mixed-ingredient dinners for babies six to nine months. Stage Three, coded green, includes fruits, vegetables and dinners with more texture for babies nine to 12 months. Stage Four (Table Time) includes soups and dinners, such as beef stew and spaghetti with meat sauce, for babies one year or older. These foods for older babies come in 12-oz. jars, enough for two servings, one of which can be for an older sibling, Mr. Hoyvald said.

The executive said the program will be expanded into other markets later this year, but the rate of expansion will depend on how successful the test is, he

Schlitz is back with 'gusto' ads

By JAY McCORMICK

DETROIT—Stroh Brewery Co.'s first major marketing attack for the Schlitz brand will begin next month, with a strategy that targets the beer toward young, "blue-collar" drinkers.

A new campaign resurrects the "gusto" magic of Schlitz' bygone days by incorporating it within the theme line: "Go for it America, you've got the gusto now." Stroh will continue to concentrate sales efforts in the Southeast, Southwest and "heartland" regions where the brand has suffered some erosion but remains relatively strong.

The Schlitz relaunch on April 4 is Stroh's first and most visible support of the brand since it acquired Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co. last year. It is also the initial effort of MCA Advertising, New York, which won the account when Stroh commandered an across-the-board agency shuffle last year for all its brands.

Spending on Schlitz will be down from the 1981 level of around $20 million, when it had its last full ad backing. "We have tightened up our focus," said Mike Jaeger, brand manager for Schlitz and Schlitz Light. "In those mar-

It's a case of the champ—Heineken . . .

By Udayan Gupta

In one-sided ball games, the question most often isn't who's going to win but by how much. When it comes to the beer import game, the same can be said for Heineken.

With a record 30 million cases sold in the U.S. in 1982—40% of total import beer sales and double that of Molson, its nearest competitor—Heineken is clearly head and shoulders above the rest of the peak. Indeed, for most beer industry watchers, the annual question seems to be how Heineken will outperform the rest.

The saga of Heineken's success in America is the story of the Van Munching family, which arrived here a half century ago from Holland with 50 cases of beer and proceeded to take the import beer world by storm. It is also a lesson in effective advertising and marketing.

Even though Leo Van Munching arrived in 1933 as a representative of the Heineken Brewery, it wasn't until after the war that he set up his own importing company, Van Munching & Co.

At that time, imported beers were still in their growth stage, and sales were limited to a few large metropolitan areas. "The population that drank imports was concentrated around port cities," notes John McAna, vp-national sales manager with Van Munching & Co., adding that the biggest consumers were people who traveled and who had already cultivated a taste for imports.

It wasn't until the 1970s that Heineken—along with the rest of the imports—experienced a real surge in demand. In fact, from a little more than 2 million cases in sales at the beginning of the decade, the brand zoomed to more than 25 million cases when the 1980s began.

Udayan Gupta, a business writer in New York, is a frequent contributor to Magazine and a columnist for Electronic Media, a Crain Communications Inc. publication.

"The change in demographics helped," notes Alvin Nilson, advertising manager with Van Munching, pointing out that the 1970s gave rise to a more cosmopolitan consumer and a changing life style, a consumer with a penchant for premium products. The awareness was fueled when the better restaurants also started serving Heineken.

IMPORTED
"Come to think of it, I'll have a Heineken."

Sixty per cent of Heineken—the No. 1 selling import—is consumed by those between 18 and 34

"They helped establish the product as a prestige item," explains Mr. Nilson. Even now, he says, most of Heineken's sales are of the on-premise variety—in restaurants and bars. While most beers, especially domestic ones, have 65% of their sales off-premise and only 35% on-premise, Heineken's consumption pattern is exactly the reverse. "The conspicuous consumption of Heineken is extensive," says Mr. McAna. "In fact, a lot of the people who are drinking it are probably on expense accounts."

Mr. McAna emphasizes that there is a marked difference between the typical Heineken drinker and the consumer of domestics. His beer, he claims, is aimed more at the upscale young adult—"Sixty per cent of our beer is consumed by those between 18 and 34," he points out—who put a premium on status and prestige.

Heineken's advertising has continued to stress the beer as a class item, not just in print and radio but also on tv. In fact, among the imports, Heineken is the most consistent user of network tv.

Last year, Heineken ran 110 insertions in national consumer magazines, including Business Week and Sports Illutrated, supplementing it with radio commercials on more than 200 stations 55 to 75 times weekly during the peak consumption months. Accompanying these placements were tv spots on ABC's "Wide World of Sports," National Collegiate Athletic Assn. football and the U.S. Open. The total bill was more than $15 million.

It wasn't always this way. Heineken began with modest black & white ads that aimed at building the product's image. "Heineken tastes tremendous," the first ads proclaimed. But by 1967, Van Munching was prepared to go for broke.

It became the first importer to place full-page, four-color ads in four national magazines in order to reach 47 million Americans coast to coast. Soon, the print was supplemented by radio. "We went into the cities we were strong in and used radio as a local medium. It gave us an added dimension," explains Mr. Nilson. Lately, Van Munching has turned to tv—spot as well as network—to help extend the message in a more dynamic form.

Curiously, the company has made no effort to use cable. It is firm in its belief that cable's numbers are open to question and that cable has yet to develop into an advertiser's medium.

The systematic increase in media has helped to increase the awareness for Van Munching's import. The green bottle with its misty, fresh look and the "Come to think of it I'll have a Heineken" campaign developed by SSC&B, New York, have become attractive sellers of the product.

The growth in Heineken's advertising budget has been sudden and dramatic. Even though the company claims that it has always devoted 5% of its sales to advertising, the real boost came in 1980, when sales of Heineken had slipped badly.

To counter the slippage, Heineken went into tv for the first time with a campaign created by Doremus Uptown and a budget estimated by some to be $10 million—a sharp contrast with the total budget of less than $2 million in 1979.

Nonetheless, the $15 million spent on advertising last year was unusually large for Van Munching, notes Mr. McAna, who points out that the boost was helped by a favorable showing of the dollar with respect to the Dutch guilder. Since the company pays for its imports in guilders, it had a windfall gain in 1982, some of which was allocated to advertising. The company has no intentions of scaling back on its 1983 budget either. It expects to increase the 1982 total by 10%.

Heineken's advertising has been well supported by a local distribution policy in which the company has paid great atten-

On the lighter side

Recently, when asked to describe a particular imported beer, a waitress summed it up like this: "It's a Heineken light."

The beer she described is Amstel Light.

Being associated with Heineken may be Amstel Light's strong suit and the reason for its rapid surge of acceptance. It may also be a detriment to Heineken and the over-all sales of America's leading importer.

But so far, being part of the Heineken mystique has not hurt the import. In less than three years, Amstel Light has emerged as America's fastest growing import—possibly the fastest growing beer in the country.

In 1981, its first full year of distribution, Amstel Light sold 250,000 cases. By 1982, sales had doubled to 500,000 cases. And this year, according to Van Munching & Co., the U.S. distributor of both Heineken and Amstel Light, total sales could be as high as 750,000 cases.

Of course, with less than 1% of the total market for imports, Amstel Light has a long way to go. Nonetheless, as the first European low-calorie beer—"Ninety-five calories never tasted so imported," read the ads—it is making its point.

In many ways, Amstel Light is a curiousity. Even though it carries the name of Amstel—a popular Dutch brand acquired by Heineken in the late '60s—it is a product conceived primarily for American tastes.

John McAna, vp-national sales manager with Van Munching & Co., notes that Leo Van Munching Jr. thought of a European light import as far back as 1978, but it took another 2½ years before the beer was developed and introduced in the U.S. The beer was sold initially in six test markets—New York, Florida, Los Angeles, Houston, northern Virginia and New Orleans.

Apart from being an import conceptualized as an export—a common phenomenon among the brands of many Third World countries—Amstel Light ads have played down the country of manufacture. In fact, the country of origin occupies an obscure position on the brand label.

. . . and a challenger—Kronenbourg

By Brian Rogers

"We got some prizes. We got some T-shirts. Coming up, No. 324. No. 355."

"We got a 283 out there?"

The scene is Tuesday's. On Columbus Ave. One of the fashionable boutique-like bars on New York's Upper West Side.

And it's in the trenches. Although as trenches go, Tuesday's is a rather pleasant one.

The trenches are where the real war is fought in marketing imported beer. On the street. The battles are between distributors for on-premise distribution—in bars, restaurants and hotels—and for prime cooler and shelf space—in delis, groceries and supermarkets.

The occasion tonight at Tuesday's is "Kronenbourg Night." It's a promotion for a French import that is Europe's largest-selling bottle of beer and which entered the U.S. market in 1980.

"What we're doing, is creating an event," says Robert Wilson, who came to Kronenbourg USA in June as executive vp-marketing and sales from All Brand Importers, a unit of Nabisco Brands, where he was in charge of U.S. sales and marketing operations for Moosehead beer. "What's a 'Kronenbourg Night?' You're supposed to do two things. First, generate awareness of the brand—and trial—and then generate additional business for the retailer."

"In an import beer, you must get what they call 'on-premise distribution,'" says Harold Levine, chairman of Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver, the ad agency for Kronenbourg USA. "Then you must go to the supermarket. Because if somebody tries it at a bar, likes it, they're going to go buy a six-pack.

"With domestic beer, there's a heavier purchase in the supermarket—which is off-premise—and in an imported beer, there's more on-premise than off-premise. You know what it is, it's a status, image thing. We've learned that drinking a beer is like a necktie. It's a reflection of one's personality."

The "Kronenbourg Night" at Tuesday's, which was fairly hastily put together, was a rather quiet affair, with a simple raffling of prizes. Other "Kronenbourg Nights" are more elaborate, with themes such as "Take Home a Set" (of Kronenbourg glasses) and "Get Mugged" (Kronenbourg mugs). Such promotions have played a large role in gaining and maintaining on-premise distribution and consumption and, generally, in creating brand awareness.

In 1980, when Kronenbourg launched its opening salvo on the U.S. market in New York, that brand awareness reached 90%—parity with Heineken—after six months.

Brian Rogers is a New York-based business writer, who upon receiving the assignment, acknowledged that Kronenbourg was his favorite imported beer. All reporting involved was objective, of course.

"When we started," Mr. Levine notes, "we decided that the distribution of the product would be solely in New York. We knew that there were five markets that probably represented 65% of the beer business. And New York is probably half of that. So it probably represented 25% to 30% of beer."

After New York, it was the metropolitan area—Long Island, Connecticut and New Jersey. The Hamptons and the Jersey shore are significant summer beer markets. And then on to Boston.

Kronenbourg's initial ad campaign ran on local radio and tv in New York, and later in Boston, with the theme, "Europeans like Heineken, but love Kronenbourg." The ads emphasized the brew's status as Europe's No. 1 bottle of beer.

Although Kronenbourg was first brewed by the Hatt family in the Alsation city of Strasbourg in 1664 (then part of Germany, now part of France), it is only over the last 10 years—since the brewery was purchased by BSN-Gervais Danone, the $4 billion European food and beverage conglomerate—that Kronenbourg has gained its No. 1 position on the continent.

Kronenbourg is now marketed in more than 70 countries throughout the world, and Mr. Wilson describes BSN-Gervais Danone as being perhaps "the P&G or General Foods people of Europe."

Though the beer is French, the name, Kronenbourg, is German. It means "crown village." The water used to make the beer at the Strasbourg brewery comes up in Alsace in underground springs from a source in the mountains on the German side of the border.

"We don't go to any great lengths to explain where we're from," Mr. Wilson says. "We explain Kronenbourg as Europe's No. 1 bottle of beer. We first tell you we're from Europe, which is important. From its name, from its gothic lettering, one would draw the conclusion that it's probably German. That doesn't bother me at all because I know they believe the best beer in the world comes from Germany.

"If you like it to be French, I'll tell you it's French. If you don't, I'll tell you it has the best of both worlds. There's the craftsmanship of the Germans, and there's the finesse of the French."

When Mr. Wilson started with the company in June, 1982, the beer was being marketed in 14 states. Now it's in 24, and the distribution network has been increased by 90 wholesalers—from approximately 150 to approximately 240.

In 1982, Kronenbourg sold 700,000 cases in the U.S. market, and Mr. Wilson's goal is to reach half the current sales of Beck's, the No. 3 import, by 1985, which, with Beck's now at 6 million cases, would put Kronenbourg at 3 million.

"We're at the crossroads," says Mr. Wilson. "We are geared to begin a national expansion."

One major step in advancing these goals will be the launching of Kronenbourg's first national campaign this May. The new one-page, four-color ads are running in Playboy, Penthouse and Omni, with the theme, "Drink Better. Not Bitter."

EUROPEANS
LIKE HEINEKEN.
BUT LOVE
Kronenbourg.
EUROPE'S #1 BOTTLE OF BEER

Current Kronenbourg advertising assures us that people like Heineken, but Kronenbourg . . . that's true love.

About the campaign, Mr. Wilson waxes enthusiastic: "'Better. Not Bitter.' That's a very succinct statement. It's almost a statement of life. It's the kind of thing that a Norman Vincent Peale would say. Believe it or not, it really is."

"They often say that research can destroy creativity," notes Mr. Levine. "This is a situation where research helped creativity. And we spent an awful lot of money on research. We did four surveys."

Two syndicated surveys, Beer Track, done by Madison Research, and Mediamark Research (MRI), measured brand awareness and imported beer drinkers' demographics, respectively. Then Kronenbourg made two of its own surveys, one on usage and attitudes; the other was a brand imagery study using photo associations. Also on hand, for comparison, was a June, 1981, MRI study.

"We asked people in our proprietary usage and attitudes study," says Mr. Levine, "the most important information which would cause the trial of a new imported beer. And the conclusion was: 'taste/flavor'—the predominant reason why people try a new imported beer, with twice as many people wanting a non-bitter, smooth taste than a strong, full-bodied taste.

On the brand imagery study, high percentages of respondents perceived Kronenbourg as being a "more for someone else," "not for everybody," "one bottle at a time," "out of a glass beer."

Also, in the studies, two other factors turned out to be strongly motivating sales claims: That Kronenbourg has been brewed since 1664 and that it's Europe's No. 1 bottle of beer.

So Mr. Levine's agency built a strategy to, as he says, "convey that Kronenbourg is a European beer with a full-bodied, nonbitter taste. Drink Kronenbourg, and you'll have the taste of an authentic, full-bodied European beer, with a unique, smooth, nonbitter taste. And support it with the 300 years of heritage."

Consequently, the new Kronenbourg ad features a four-color photograph of an overflowing stein, one open bottle of Kronenbourg and another on standby. Underneath the head reads, "Drink Better. Not Bitter." The copy enumerates the European No. 1 bottle of beer status, explains the beer's 300-year heritage, hails the taste and exhorts the reader to try it.

"Every element of it [the ad] has been thought out," says Mr. Wilson, who's given his own personal touches to the ad, "from the crimped cap to give masculinity to the spilling of the beer. Our previous ad was prissy. It looked so perfect. The beer was right to the top and there wasn't a drop coming down. I got it pouring down the side and all over the table. That's the way a guy ought to drink. Pour it in and that's it. I used a stein, because I wanted to project a Ger-

Public agencies had a rough '82

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

NEW YORK—Talk to agency presidents about 1983 and, nearly to a man, they will echo the chief executive who quipped: "I just hope it will be less worse than 1982."

A glance at the yearend figures of the publicly held agencies explains the poignancy behind that remark. Only three emerged from 1982 with gains in their net income, while the others suffered substantial losses. Interpublic Group of Cos. came out looking best in net income with $19.8 million, a 30% jump over the year before. BBDO enjoyed a 9% increase to $14.98 million, while Grey had a gain of 2% to a net of $6.8 million.

So much for the good news.

On the downside, JWT Group posted a whopping 96% drop to $267,000 from $7.1 million in 1981. Doyle Dane Bernbach had the second-worst loss, down 31% to $7.6 million. Ogilvy & Mather was down 10.3%, to $14.8 million, and Foote, Cone & Belding dropped 8.9% to $10.9 million.

Revenues in 1982 weren't as bad as net incomes. All the publicly held shops posted gains, with Grey gaining the most and JWT Group the least. Grey was up 25% to $142.2 million as its revenue line included income from three foreign companies that were not consolidated in 1981. JWT gained 3% to $406.7 million.

Agencies continued to attribute their generally anemic results in large part to foreign exchange losses suffered as a result of the strengthened dollar. For instance, BBDO's results include currency exchange losses of $322,000 for the year; JWT's currency losses totaled $4.4 million, and Interpublic's were $5.4 million in 1982.

DDB's report stated: "The earnings decline for the year is entirely attributable to weak classified advertising volume at Bernard Hodes Advertising (recruitment advertising), devaluations of the Mexican peso and a higher effective tax rate." FCB also reported operating losses in certain international offices and in its pr division.

Fourth-quarter net incomes epitomized the entire year. JWT Group, still suffering the repercussions of the syndication scandal of a year ago, recorded a 122% loss, plummeting to a loss of $549,000. The substantial losses are attributable to the shutdown of its syndication unit, declines in recruitment advertising, foreign exchange losses and a tax rate that exceeds 100% (AA, March 7). DDB's fourth-quarter net dropped 27% to $3.6 million, while FCB was down 20.9% to $4.2 million.

In terms of fourth-quarter revenues, all seven agencies posted gains, led by Interpublic, up 29% to $166.1 million.#

ITT getting aggressive in Europe

By JASPER BECKER

BRUSSELS—ITT Europe is about to launch its most ambitious corporate ad campaign in history. The marketer will spend $2 million this year in a stepped-up effort to bring its name and full product line directly before the European public (AA, March 14).

"Research revealed that ITT's image is not as good as it was presumed to be in four key markets," said Terry Quinn, ITT Europe's vp-director of corporate relations and advertising. The problem has become severe now that national telecommunication monopolies (PTT)—ITT's traditional customers—are being deregulated, and ITT products are being sold more often directly to the public. As a result, lack of name recognition is a serious liability.

"Before, we used to deal with a dozen or two PTTs, and so there was no need to do more than promote the local subsidiary," Mr. Quinn said. Now, "we want ordinary companies to be persuaded to buy our products, such as internal telephone systems, teleprinters and facsimile machines—anything except mainframe computers—and the ordinary consumer will be interested in the new digital tv set we will launch later this year," he added.

A further incentive for the ITT campaign is competition from American Telephone & Telegraph—preparing to meet ITT in all its traditional markets.

ITT's local companies, such as Bell Telephone in Belgium or Standard Electric Lorenz in Germany, are of such size and importance that people don't know the true range of ITT's products or technological resources, Mr. Quinn continued.

There also is the trend toward electronics companies, such as West Germany's troubled giant AEG-Telefunken and Siemens, or computer companies, such as IBM, treading into each other's markets as the dividing lines between traditional businesses blur.

While IBM spends about $4 million each year on corporate advertising, Siemens about $3 million and Hitachi and AEG between $1 million and $2 million, ITT Europe has not felt the need to match these efforts, until now.

The new campaign will be aimed at opinion leaders in West Germany, Belgium, Spain and Italy via international business magazines and newspapers. The campaign was created by British agency KMP Partnership, London, and will take up another theme, according to Mr. Quinn.

"We want to get across the message that we are a high-technology company with enormous resources and with products in a huge range of areas, so that we will be saying, for instance, that ITT Europe is supplying the Japanese with the best and cheapest chips, that we have made a breakthrough with digital tv and so on," Mr. Quinn said.

The corporate campaign will back up national campaigns in Europe, like the German one that gets $5 million in its own right.#

Budget Rent a Car follows the end of gift giveaways (AA, Feb. 21) with a new promotion offering $34.95 daily rental of a Lincoln-Mercury Cougar and $100 rebate to customers who later buy the car. Tv spots, via D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius, Chicago, break today on ABC and CBS network news and sports.

Nets may ask 15% to 22% more for fall

By CRAIG REISS

New York—Buyers and sellers alike are conceding that this year's upfront network tv prime time prices will increase at least 15%, although network sources say they could begin negotiations by asking for as much as a 22% hike over last year's record-setting prices.

Furthermore, agency buyers are speculating that the networks will attempt to create a panic among advertisers by stressing that telecasts of the Olympic Games, political conventions and the sale of national political advertising in 1984 will devour available network commercial inventories. The shrunken inventories, combined with an unexpectedly quick upturn in the national economy, will be the main points the networks will stress to create a true seller's market.

Agency negotiators, however, argue that the lost inventory amounts to only about 3% of total network commercial time and that the impact will not be nearly as great as the networks want advertisers to believe. At the same time, several major agency negotiators are telling their clients to be prepared to make their buys early in the upfront season—May through July—rather than hope slow sales will bring prices down as the summer progresses.

If the projections hold, the networks should realize their second consecutive year of record price increases in the upfront market. Last year, upfront prices rose between 13% and 16%, the first time the networks were able to secure double-digit rate increases.

While claiming that the 22% figure being floated early by the net-

Baseball, Apple link for dream team tour

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

Apple Computer and Major League Baseball will join forces to produce one of the largest promotions in sports: A "dream team" tour by former big-league ball players who will play at least 24 games in Major League cities between May and September.

Apple completed negotiations with Major League Baseball's Promotion Corp. last week and will shell out $1 million to Major League Baseball for the rights to the promotion.

That, according to league sources, is the largest fee that baseball has received for a promotion. In terms of dollars spent, the promotion, known as the Apple Computer Dream Team Tour, will be second only to Gillette's All-Star game ballot promotion, the most ambitious and costly in sports. Sources said Apple additionally will spend almost $2 million to promote and advertise the tour.

Major League Baseball is negotiating with a major automobile marketer that would lend its name to a U.S. "dream team" game in Japan against former Japanese all-stars.

Steve Doctrow, director of promotional marketing at Chiat/Day, the Apple agency, said the pioneering personal computer company is investing in the tour to help stimulate traffic at the dealer level. He said Apple dealers will be able to participate in the promotion on Broadcast joins cable, newspapers in bid for ads

Teletext arena grows

and DIANE MERMIGAS

The decks are cleared for tv broadcasters to enter electronic publishing, setting the stage for a future showdown with the new medium's other powerhouses—the newspaper and cable tv industries. All three are expected to compete for advertiser dollars.

The green light that broadcasters had been waiting for came in a 5-2 Federal Communications Commission decision last week that authorized "teletext" service, as the broadcast form of electronic publishing is known. FCC-sanctioned teletext experiments have been run by CBS, some public tv stations and broadcast groups such as Taft and Bonneville International

Those already involved in electronic publishing welcomed the competition that will arouse the interest of viewers, set manufacturers and advertisers.

"The more players the better because the industry now is quite small and the participation of broadcasters like CBS and NBC will help it to become known and accepted more rapidly," said Tom Ray, a spokesman for Keycom Electronic Publishing, in suburban Chicago, which in November launched the first nationwide 24-hour consumer teletext magazine.

Keyfax National Teletext Magazine currently is carried by 70 cable systems. The biggest obstacle to Keycom expansion, possibly by offering regionally generated magazine pages—and to the growth of teletext generally—has been convincing tv set and decoder manufacturers that the new technology (whether delivered by cable, existing telephone lines or over-the-air) is here to stay.

"With CBS and NBC now allowed to pursue teletext on more than just an experimental basis, and being the mass distribution organizations in the tv business, it is certain to provide manufacturers

D'Arcy wins Penney's catalog division account

New York—J.C. Penney has awarded its catalog business to D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius. The catalog division, which had no previous agency, was earlier estimated to be worth about $9 million, although a Penney's executive now says the spending has not been determined yet. Two other finalists, McCaffrey & McCall and N W Ayer, continue on fashion and financial services, respectively.

RCA disc drive pitches 'entertainer of the year'

Indianapolis—RCA Consumer Electronics will announce a new advertising campaign this week for its SelectaVision videodisc player line. The drive features actor Gene Kelly as spokesman and carries the tag line, "The entertainer of the year." Commercials will debut on network tv next week along with radio and p.o.p. support. The campaign remains within RCA's over-all consumer electronics theme, "We'll open your eyes." Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, handles the account.

Arco is testing cash-activated gasoline pumps

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

The Atlantic Richfield Co., which dropped credit cards last year, is testing cash-activated gasoline pumps in some of its Los Angeles-based Arco stations. If the test is successful, Arco intends to take the system national.

Arco's unit consists of a separate terminal, similar in style to an automatic teller machine, that accepts $1 and $5 bills. The Arco customer drives up to the terminal—located on the pump island—inserts an exact amount of cash for the gasoline purchase, presses a button denoting that a final cash entry has been made, and proceeds to pump gas. When the deposited amount is reached, the pump cuts off.

A machine that accepts $10 and $20 bills will be tested at a later date.

Arco's test is another step by a major oil marketer to find and employ a variation of an automated pump system. At least three other companies—Mobil Oil, Texaco and Derby Refining—are testing credit card-activated pumps (AA, Nov. 15). Sun Electric Corp., Crystal Lake, Ill., has been manufacturing and marketing a totally automated service station management system—known as the Station Minder—since September, 1982. That system has been installed in about 1,000 retail gasoline outlets throughout the country.

Arco's unit, called Express Prepay, is an outgrowth of the com-

D'Arcy execs retire; Bay named chairman

Bloomfield Hills, Mich.—Two advertising chieftians are stepping down at D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius Worldwide—James Orthwein as board chairman and Ernest Jones as chairman of the executive committee.

Harold Bay Jr. becomes board chairman and chief executive officer; he had been president-chief exec. Milton Coulson Jr. is leaving as vice-chairman of the office here. George Sparks, an art director who posed for the "Mr. Goodwrench" print ads, also is departing. All of them are retiring.

The agency said Mr. Orthwein's retirement "completes the top-management change planned in January of last year when Mr. Bay was elected ceo." D'Arcy had billings of $1.1 billion in 1982 and numbers Pontiac, General Motors corporate, Cadillac division, Detroit Diesel Allison, Dow Chemical, General Tire, Alberto-Culver, Amoco Oil, Standard Oil (Ind.), CPC International, Heublein, RCA, Anheuser-Busch, Crown Zellerbach and Mars as clients.

Mr. Orthwein was chairman and

Calvin Klein, Jesse Jeans downplay product

In jeans ads, less is more

By PAT SLOAN

New York—Three and four years ago, designer jeans were "in," and the popular way of advertising them was on a leggy model whose backside could withstand close scrutiny by the camera.

But now, selling the obvious is out. The way to advertise jeans, it seems, is to show less of the product and more of everything else.

If that appears to be strange logic, consider: By early 1981, there could hardly have been a man, woman or child who hadn't heard of "Calvins," Sergio Valente, Jordache, Gloria Vanderbilt or Bonjour—brands that individually received as much as $8 million in advertising during 1980.

In those cases, however, familiarity bred, if not contempt, then surely market saturation. Advertising budgets started creeping down, as did prices, when products began proliferating in discount stores. From May, 1981, to May, 1982, according to Warren Hirsh, president, J. Breed Clothing Co., within the $1 billion-plus market status jeans suffered at least a 25% decline in sales. During the course of 1981, companies such as Jordache, which spent more than $5 million on jeans advertising in 1980, spent maybe a fifth as much as they concentrated instead on sportswear, according to Leading National Advertisers Inc.

But last July, the designer jeans market started to pick up as marketers freshened their standard denim wares with black denim and stonewashed looks and softened the design of their lines (AA, April 19). Ad spending, until now, seemingly had lagged behind the apparent recovery.

However, last month Calvin Klein Jeans, a division of Puritan Fashions, began a new campaign that signals a significant increase in spending by that company, which last year spent just over $500,000 on jeans ads. And this month, J. Breed Clothing introduced a new campaign for Jesse Jeans that manages to be provocative without taking on the tones of a burlesque bump and grind.

Although the two campaigns bear no resemblance to each other, they share one common feature: A decided deemphasis of product that begs the viewers' attention.

As usual, Calvin Klein management would not discuss the way it advertises jeans. But this much is known. About 23 commercials have been shot, 14 of which now are airing. The work of photographer Richard Avedon and copywriter Doon Arbus (AA, Nov. 15), the spots are divided between five women, identified as Andie, Antonia, Lauren, Martha and Shari (the latter said to be the daughter of singer-actor Harry Belafonte).

Each of the five represents a different psychographic and demographic type: Andie, southern, sultry and country; Antonia, international, sophisticated and glitzy; Lauren, ladylike classic; Shari, athletic and in-

Cinemax readies a run at HBO

By SUSAN SPILLMAN

New York—Time Inc., revamping its 2½-year-old Cinemax pay tv network, reportedly hopes to transform the service from its current status of Home Box Office's little sister into that of its strongest rival.

Cinemax was created as the film buff's supplement to HBO. From the outset the network has boasted an all-movie lineup—featuring films that are different from those playing on HBO. Within the next few months, however, assorted original programing formats will be added to strengthen Cinemax's schedule, said Alan Levy, a spokesman for Cinemax. One source said Cinemax is considering, as one format, "clip" shows based on the careers of major film stars.

In addition, Time Inc. "is seriously considering" airing some films on Cinemax and HBO during the same month, other sources at the network said.

The parent company made its first distinctive move to strengthen Cinemax last fall when it began to premiere some more titles on Cinemax before showings on HBO. Examples include "Diner," "The French Lieutenant's Woman" and

Small Agency Panel

Satisfaction: Easy to promise, hard to deliver

By Joseph D. Brown

Highlights from a recent survey of America's medium-size advertising agencies indicate that few clients are really satisfied with agency services. Only 15% of these agencies thought their clients were extremely satisfied. The survey indicated that there is considerable information that would be useful in developing better client-agency relations, and the major point seemed to be communications.

Questionnaires were mailed nationwide to 410 randomly selected agencies employing between eight and 50 people. A stamped envelope was provided for returning the questionnaire. The 51% return rate indicates the high interest in client-agency relations.

Joseph D. Brown is professor of marketing and director of the bureau of business research, Ball State University, Muncie, Ind. His is also research director of Bonsib Inc., Fort Wayne, Ind.

The first section was on the importance of services and client satisfaction with those services. The agencies were asked to indicate the degree of over-all client satisfaction with the agency and the trend of the client-agency relationship. Next they indicated aspects of doing business with clients and agency satisfaction with clients. The responses indicated a proportionate return rate from five major geographic areas of the U.S.

Agency services

The first section of the questionnaire listed eight services and asked the respondent to check the importance of these services. The respondent could also specify other services not listed. The eight listed services were:

- Creative execution and production.
- Creative strategy.
- Media planning and placement.
- Marketing strategy.
- Research.
- Public relations.
- Direct mail.
- Copy testing.

Most agencies feel that creative execution and production are either absolutely necessary or are very important agency services. Creative strategy is viewed as absolutely necessary or very important by most of the agencies. Of the agencies responding, many consider media planning and placement either absolutely necessary or very important while about the same number consider marketing strategy and planning necessary or very important. In the opinion of agency respondents the remaining services (research, public relations, direct mail and copy testing) are considerably less important as client services.

Client satisfaction with agency

Agency executives then indicated the degree to which they thought the clients were satisfied with agency performance in each of these service areas. Slightly more

A judgment call

How useful are agency review boards?

By D. Kyle Felt

Several months ago, our chairman asked me to investigate whether our agency should use a formal review board system. Having gotten my early start in a large, somewhat bureaucratic agency, I was familiar with the process.

I served as secretary of the review board for a couple of years and witnessed many more abuses of the process than productive uses. Understandably, the idea of a review board was not very attractive to me.

With varying emphasis, review boards set out to inform top management, okay strategy and bring new thinking.

D. Kyle Felt

With varying degrees of emphasis, all review boards set out to inform top management, approve and influence strategy or executions and provide new thinking.

These are certainly valid objectives. And because our chairman suggested the idea of instituting a review board system, I wanted an objective view of how current systems are constituted and perceived and how productive they are. Here is what I found:

- The bigger the agency, the more review boards. Of the agencies contacted, half had some kind of formal review board system. About two-thirds of the large agencies (billings of more than $150 million) had a review board system, compared with one-third of those respondents who billed less than $150 million. Interestingly, we learned that all Procter & Gamble agencies do not have a review board system.

Most of the creative "hot shops" tend to stay away from a formal review board, relying on the judgment of the top executives or principals. In one case, we talked to a senior member of an agency who seemed enthusiastic about his agency's review board system only to have the founder, in a separate call, emphatically deny that there was any system other than the one in which he "saw all of the work."

- Review: Before or after the fact? Surprisingly, one-third of the agencies who review marketing and advertising plans formally review work after client presentation.

The reviewing usually is done by a five-member body made up of creative director, president and senior account managers.

About half the time, review boards are called to meet on request. However, the largest agencies tend to have more rigid scheduling of review boards.

- Review boards get mixed reviews. Response to review board systems by executives contacted was about a third positive, a third negative and a third neutral. Positive comments centered on ideas generated by the review board, use of review boards as means of informing management and their value in polishing a presentation before client meetings.

Negative comments centered on politics and a perception of the review board members as lacking experience and understanding of the brands and categories under discussion.

It is interesting to note that review boards composed of operational executives are more likely to be described positively while policy-making executives sitting on review boards are described more negatively.

Most respondents agreed that a review board is more important for larger agencies than smaller ones; clients are not reassured knowing their plans have been reviewed by a review board, and a review board is only as good as its members.

A funny thing happened on the way to setting up a review board at Warwick Advertising: We didn't. Our decision was based on our understanding of our needs and strengths.

We are a medium-size agency (about $120 million in billing), and our top management people don't have to rely on formal meetings to become informed. Also, our top management doesn't need a mechanism to approve or exert influence over strategy or execution. Instead, this process is inherent in management involvement.

In focusing on the constant need for new thinking, we created an ad hoc "resource" within the agency that is actively used by our management supervisors. Purposely, the resource has no name, no fixed membership, no regular meeting schedule. It is an intellectual entity, not a political one.

The idea is this: At the request of a management supervisor, the president or chairman, a group of five or six of our best brains, representing the various disciplines in the agency, meet with the account group that specifically defines an important problem or opportunity. The resource group becomes immersed in the particular business at hand . . . preparing a new business pitch. The principal difference, however, is that the resource group has access to most of the client's relevant information. The group meets as often as necessary over two or three weeks and then meets with the account group, president and chairman to discuss their recommendations, options and ideas.

The account group has no obligation to accept recommendations from the resource group. The best testimony to the value of the concept is that management supervisors continue to call upon it to get a second opinion or new thinking.

It is interesting to note that review boards composed of operational executives are likely to be described positively while policy-making executives sitting on review boards are described more negatively.

Obviously, asking for help at our place is seen as an indication of strength, not weakness. Will our "no-name resource" continue? The answer is, "As long as our people find it useful."

So, if an agency is considering a review board system, or rethinking an existing system, it should consider these questions before deciding:

1. What's the real purpose: Control, information, new thinking?
2. Is a review board practical for the size of the agency?
3. Can it be or is it positioned positively?
4. Will it undermine the accountability of account managers?
5. Will the client care whether there is a review board?
6. Will it slow up the strategic and creative process?
7. Will review board members have the time to prepare themselves adequately for such deliberations?
8. Will there be continuity in membership?
9. Is there a senior person on staff who can run the system and resist the inherent political temptations?
10. Is it willing to monitor results with an eye to adjusting the system to meet the changing needs of the agency, clients or people?
11. Will clients really benefit from the process?

Satisfaction

than half the agencies believe that their clients are extremely satisfied with creative execution and production. For the remaining seven services, the extremely satisfied responses ranged from a low for copy testing to almost half for creative strategy.

The next question was, "Do certain agency services contribute more to achieving better client satisfaction than other services?" Each agency's perception of its performance was calculated by weighting the eight services according to the importance attached to them and calculating a weighted over-all performance average.

Satisfaction impact scores determined the most important service in those agencies that had clients who were most satisfied. Research appears to be the most important service in those agencies whose clients are extremely satisfied; it received a weighted score of 233.

The scores drop sharply after that. Creative execution and production received a score of 197; creative strategy, 184; media planning and placement, 139; public relations, 134; direct mail, 128; marketing strategy and planning, 118, and copy testing, 100.

When asked how they would describe current over-all client satisfaction with their agency, most advertising executives (84%) replied that their clients are just reasonably satisfied. Only 15% said their clients are extremely satisfied, and 1% said their clients were unhappy with the service they were receiving. Just over half (55%) of the agency executives believe that client-agency relationships have stayed about the same, and a small percentage (10%) think these relationships have deteriorated over the last five to ten years. Thirty-five per cent believe the relationships have improved. This suggests that there is much room for improvement.

Aspects of doing business

In the next section the agency was first asked to rank the importance of the seven aspects of doing business with a client. These aspects were:

- Sufficient input.
- Clearcut decisions.
- Access to top management.
- Effective approval procedures.
- Sound marketing and advertising background.
- Reasonable demands.
- Fairness in assigning.

Most of the agency executives feel that sufficient input from their clients is vitally important. This is by far the most important aspect of dealing with a client, at least from the agency's point of view. Just over one-third of the agencies say they believe that sound marketing and advertising background are vitally important.

Agency satisfaction with clients

After ranking the importance of specific aspects of working with clients, agency executives then indicated their degree of satisfaction with their clients' performance in each of the seven aspects. The low percentages indicate that agencies are not extremely satisfied with many aspects of the way clients deal with agencies.

The next step was to determine which aspects of dealing with a client contribute most to over-all agency satisfaction. For each agency, the over-all weighted average performance of their clients was calculated. The calculation was similar to that used in determining the agencies' weighted evaluations of performance. The seven importance ratings and corresponding performance ratings supplied by each agency for their clients were used.

Statistical calculations determined those aspects of client-agency relationships that contribute most to greater satisfaction on the part of the agency. Of the various aspects involved in doing business with a client that help to achieve agency satisfaction with the client, fairness in assigning work leads the list with a weighted score of 156. Very close is the reasonableness of demands that a client places on an agency, with a score of 145. Following are sufficient input, 131; clear-cut decisions, 128; effective approval procedures, 125; access to top management, 108, and sound marketing and advertising background, 100.

Much valuable information can be gained about performance from periodic, formal evaluations. Such evaluations should include senior people. The goal is to become more mindful of others' problems. Clients must realize just how important their input is in maintaining an effective relationship with their agency. Clients need to be aware that agencies are not extremely satisfied with many aspects of their clients' input. Constructive criticism can be effective both ways. Therefore, the key to better client-agency relations must lie in better communications. If agencies and clients would communicate what is expected, steps to better relations could be achieved.

Marketers await return of 'Star Wars' summer

By BOB MARICH

The eagerly awaited third film of the "Star Wars" saga shapes up as much a potential blockbuster in merchandising and promotional tie-ins as it is expected to be at the box office.

Two major package goods marketers—Coca-Cola and Procter & Gamble—and a fast-food chain—Burger King—plan national promotions tied to the $35 million "Return of the Jedi," a 20th Century-Fox release opening in late May. Pepperidge Farm will have "Jedi" cookies. And Kenner Products, a General Mills unit that holds the toy license, plans to spend more than $12 million to advertise action figures and other merchandise bearing the "Star Wars" imprint.

The "Jedi" creations said to be in line for much hoopla are Ewoks, bear-like animals that dwell in a forest, and the stuffed dolls figure to be a new entry in the teddy bear market. All told, Kenner will be adding 17 new characters to its action-figure roster this year. The new items are supposedly under wraps until the

Luisi and JWT swap lawsuits

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

New York—After 14 months of silence, Marie Luisi is suing her former employer, JWT Group, for $50 million-plus. Thompson said it will countersue for an undisclosed amount of money.

The former senior vp-head of syndication and spot tv sales at J. Walter Thompson Co., who was fired in February, 1982, when "accounting irregularities" turned up in her unit, has filed a claim against JWT in New York state supreme court that names five JWT executives and seeks more than $50 million for "purported damage to her reputation and other alleged injuries," according to a JWT spokesman.

Mrs. Luisi, through her attorneys, scheduled meetings with

NBC opens piggyback gate

By DIANE MERMIGAS

NBC officials are denying that advertiser pressure prompted them to begin experimenting with "piggybacking," adjoining 15-second spots for unrelated products of a single sponsor.

Joseph Iaricci, vp-sales administration at NBC-TV, said the new arrangement announced last week will allow advertisers with small budgets to enter the network arena and will aid larger advertisers with many products or with special promotions.

Executives of all three networks, however, confirm that Alberto-Culver Co. approached them last month, requesting it be allowed to sell two of its unrelated products in one 30-second slot, 15-seconds for each. Until now, the networks allowed advertisers to air adjoining 15-second spots within a regular 30-second spot only for related or "integrated" products.

A source said there had been discussion of the Melrose Park, Ill.-based Alberto filing suit against the networks and/or the National Assn. of Broadcasters if the piggyback spots were not approved. NAB codes used to prohibit piggybacking as well, but the code was dropped because of government antitrust arguments.

James Witherell, group vp of Alberto-Culver, commented, "We do not have any legal action pending against the networks or the NAB." He would not comment specifically on whether the subject of legal action had ever been taken up with these parties, however, although stating, "From time to time we've talked to the networks about different scheduling."

Mr. Iaricci also denied that the new plan is being offered as a hedge against spiraling prime time ad rates or as an alternative to a proposed third-phase expansion of network prime time ad inventory next fall. NBC reluctantly went along with earlier phases of tri-network ad inventory expansions last fall and this month.

Mr. Witherell called the NBC move on piggybacking "enlightened," and said it was "a very healthy move for the industry. We think that utilizing tv commercials in some cases to advertise more than one product is a very viable and a very good idea, especially as costs continue to escalate."

The toiletries and household products company has long been a vocal proponent of the piggyback concept. For example, chief executive officer Leonard Lavin appeared in the early

CAB: Advertisers must recognize two-tv universe

Cable gets serious on ads

By SUSAN SPILLMAN

New York—The hype is gone and the hard work has begun. Cable tv finally is hauling out the heavy-duty ammunition in its battle for advertisers' dollars.

Buzzwords like "infomercial" and "narrowcasting" still could be heard occasionally at the Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau's second annual conference held here last week. But the clear and unmistakable message was: Broadcast shares are down and still dropping. Cable penetration is up and growing rapidly. A two-tv universe is emerging and advertisers must recognize it.

Cable executives, in making their most forceful pitch this year, came armed with plenty of bar graphs, sponsor testimonials and a new service that can measure the underdelivery to cable homes of any advertiser's broadcast network schedule.

"According to A.C. Nielsen's current estimates, cable penetration is at 31 million households, or 37.2% of all tv households," Robert Alter, CAB president, said in a keynote address to more than 1,000 cable operators, advertisers and agency executives. "That's 28% growth in one year. We should hit 40% by midyear, 50% by 1985 and over 60% by 1990."

At the same time, Mr. Alter added that network affiliate shares may have declined only three points from 81% to 78% in noncable households between November, 1981, and November, 1982.

■ But in cable households, the drop was from 65% to 60%. (Affiliates' shares dropped from 74 to 70 in total tv households.)

"It's becoming more and more evident that there are now two tv universes—those that have cable and those without," he said. That message was driven home by several other speakers during the

Gillette puts shower soap into liquid fray

By GAY JERVEY

In its ongoing effort to make the American female look better, feel cleaner and maintain a youthful shine and glow, Gillette Co. will introduce Bare Elegance moisturizing body shampoo nationally in June.

Following a yearlong test run in western markets (AA, Feb. 15, '82), the launch will be supported with $12.4 million in advertising, including network daytime and prime time tv and major women's magazines beginning this summer. Marschalk Co. is the agency.

As a product positioned specifically for use in the shower, Bare Elegance enters a new subsegment of the $60 million liquid soap category. Specifically, Gillette is attempting to position it as a "pampering" product that "cleans and moisturizes your bare body" at a reasonable price.

It is designed to "fit the needs of an active woman who wants to do something for herself but who can't spend a lot of time doing so," said George Motley, product manager at the Boston company.

Mr. Motley described Bare Elegance as a hybrid soap and moisturizer and said it obviates the need for any additional post-shower moisturizer. "To date,

$70 million Disney net

Yet another cable tv network, the Disney Channel, next week gets under way in about 400 cable systems representing 3.6 million potential subscribers. Success of the $70 million venture is said to depend on Disney's ability to produce new programing that lives up to its old name. The studio will spend $40 million in its first year to produce original series and specials. The 16-hour-per-day family-oriented service—retailing for about $10 per month—offers half original fare, half properties from the Disney library.

ABC sees 3 nets' revenues doubling

By CRAIG REISS

New York—The three tv networks' revenues will almost double to $10 billion by 1987, with a revenue gain this year of as much as 17% followed by a 20% gain on top of it for 1984, according to ABC president Fred Pierce.

Speaking before a group of securities analysts late last week at ABC headquarters, Mr. Pierce said network revenue gains for 1983 will benefit from the lack of a National Football League (NFL) players' strike, which cost the three nets $122 million in lost revenues during the fourth quarter of 1982. Revenue gains for 1984, Mr. Pierce said, will be bolstered by the network's coverage of the Olympic Games (see related story, Page 64), as well as by a robust upfront selling season this year.

Regarding the upfront selling season, John Severino, president of ABC-TV, told analysts the networks face "an extremely ripe environment" that is "totally a seller's market" (AA, April 4).

Mr. Severino said ABC will enter the upfront season with 20% of its inventory presold for Olympics coverage and political advertising.

Both Mr. Severino and Mr. Pierce said the network expects the upfront market to generate 20% more revenues than in 1982.

If the ABC revenue projections hold up over the next two years, ABC-TV revenues in 1983 will increase by at least $351 million, to $2.7 billion. In '84, its revenues should rise by at least $540 million to $3.2 billion, although this is a conservative estimate since ABC expects to increase its revenues at a greater rate than its two network competitors due to the Olympic Games coverage. Mr. Pierce added that revenue projections could be much higher if the national economy shows marked improvement over the next few years.

Mr. Severino said the Olympics coverage will generate $650 million for ABC, mostly from new-to-tv money and will not come out of existing tv ad budgets. He said the Winter Olympic Games are already 92% sold out, while 72% of the Summer Games' ad time has

Returning series suffer most, ratings show

By DIANE MERMIGAS

The renewed strength of miniseries and made-for-tv movies this season has contributed to a softening of the weekly series foundation, upon which the networks are attempting to construct new prime time schedules for the fall.

With just a week to go before the official end of the 1982-83 season, it appears that only 20% of the returning network series this season have managed to sustain or improve their average prime time rating and share over last season. The season before, about 40% managed that feat.

The remainder of returning series have suffered rating and share declines, the most dramatic of which has been ABC's "Joanie Loves Chachi," which as a late spring entry finished fifth last season in the A.C. Nielsen Co. rankings, but has plummeted an average 10 rating points and 13 share points this season. CBS' "Alice" has declined about 6 rating points and 11 share points since last season.

Other returning series that have experienced substantial losses include "Greatest American Hero" (down an average 5 rating, 9 share points); "Too Close for Comfort" (down 6 rating, 9 share points); "Dukes of Hazzard" (down almost 6 rating, 9 share points); "The Jeffersons" (down 3 rating, 6 share points); "Quincy" (down nearly 3 rating, 5 share points), and "Dallas" (down 4 rating, 7 share points).

"Happy Days," "Archie Bunker's Place" and "Trapper John, M.D." each have declined 3 rating and 4 share points. "Taxi" is down only one-half rating point but 6 share points, and "Love, Sidney" is down 5 rating and 5 share points.

These comparisons are based on Nielsen averages for the 28-week 1981-82 season and for 27 weeks of the current season.

Of the 11 returning series that have sustained or increased their average rating and share over last season, six are on CBS and five on ABC. They include, however, the recently concluded "M*A*S*H." Some others are "Dynasty," "Magnum, P.I.," "Simon and Simon," "The Fall Guy," "9 to 5," "Knots Landing," "Benson," "20/20" and "Cagney and Lacey."

Miniseries glut feared—Page 10.

About two-thirds of the networks' returning series this season have averaged at least a 25 share (representing households with sets turned on), the new cutoff point generally used by network programers to determine which series to renew for the fall. Of those series, ABC has 16, CBS has 14 and NBC has seven.

Of the 45 new and returning prime time series averaging a 25 share or better this season (as of April 3), 18 are comedies, 10 are dramas, seven are action-adventure, six are regularly scheduled movie nights and four are news or information.

Only eight of the 45 series are new, and only two of those (CBS' "Newhart" and "Gloria") have been on the schedule a full season. The remainder, one on NBC and three on ABC, are recently introduced limited series.#

Summer push set for Today

By RUTH STROUD

A unique nonprescription contraceptive for women will hit drugstores this summer.

The product, manufactured by VLI Corp., a small, privately held company in Costa Mesa, Cal., was approved last week by the Food & Drug Administration. Tests showed it was about 85% effective in preventing pregnancy. It consists of a soft, disposable polyurethane sponge saturated with nonoxynol-9, the same spermicidal chemical used in many other contraceptive gels and creams.

Under the brand name Today, the product reportedly will get about $8 million in marketing support. Introduction is scheduled for July in the western states, with nationwide rollout in September. Advertising will be handled by Newhoff & Prochnow and is expected to include a wide spectrum of women's magazines.

Today will come in tamperproof, pastel-colored boxes containing three sponges in vacuum-sealed pouches. Industry sources believe it could become a major contender in the market for otc contraceptives. It will sell for about $3.#

Luring the consumer with friendly persuasion

By James Auchmutey

Just a few years ago, the computer had an image problem to rival Darth Vader's. In the popular view it was something that coughed out erroneous bills, eliminated office jobs or, as in "2001," tried to commandeer spaceships.

It was not something you wanted to invite home.

But today's computer is a friendly sort—or so says the advertising.

In one recent national magazine spread, an Apple display screen was even polite enough to greet the reader with a hearty "HELLO."

In fact, computer companies have spent millions of dollars to ensure that their micro machinery will appeal not only to hardcore chipheads, but also to people who think ROMs are big men who play football for Georgia Frontiere.

Consider the advertising of the seven biggest-selling personal computers—the companies that made the most of last year's almost $5 billion market: Apple, International Business Machines Corp., Texas Instruments, Atari, Commodore Business Machines, Tandy Corp. and Timex Corp. Through the first nine months of 1982, they spent more than $22 million in national advertising, according to Leading National Advertisers.

Their ads, although as varied as their computers, contain three major elements: Making the machines seem less threatening and more "user-friendly," educating the public on just what these computers can do and—the old standby—cost.

Apple is currently the largest seller of personal computers costing more than $1,000, according to Ken Lim, an analyst with Dataquest, a market research company in Cupertino, Cal. For its advertising, it uses the first two elements.

The theme of its campaign is "The leader educates," but the more memorable part is the tagline: "The most personal computer." One of Apple's splashiest ads, an eight-page foldout that ran in national publications early this year, listed 100 tasks personal computers have undertaken, from the sublime—cross-referencing Bible verses—to the ridiculous—performing a wedding ceremony via a voice synthesizer.

All told, says Apple ad manager Henry Whitfield, the company plans to spend more than $20 million on advertising in 1983, mostly in print. By comparison, it spent less than $10 million two years ago. Chiat/Day, San Francisco, has the account.

Having sold personal systems since 1977, Apple pioneered the computer soft-sell. The company has always stressed down-to-earth ad copy, Mr. Whitfield says. "Most people are very frustrated when they read computer ads that talk about word processing and bytes and ROMs and RAMs," he says. "I mean, that's over most people's heads."

He adds that Apple addresses a public that knows the computer revolution is here, but just doesn't know how to join it.

"Most people are very frustrated when they read computer ads that talk about word processing and bytes and ROMs and RAMs."

"The avoidance factor is very strong," he says. "It's not like going in to buy a stereo. People have to learn a lot more not to feel vulnerable in a computer store, and learning is a big hassle. We're trying to cut down the hassle factor."

Mr. Whitfield believes Apple is succeeding in making computers seem more accessible. Even the names—Apple, Lisa, the upcoming Mackintosh—sound friendly (prompting wiseacres to wonder whether a Winesap computer is in the wings).

"We have an image as a California company started by a couple of young guys," Mr. Whitfield says. "We are inherently warm and fuzzy, but we need to work on being perceived as a serious supplier."

Apple's biggest competitor in the over-$1,000 market, IBM, doesn't have that problem. "People know they're credible," says Mr. Whitfield, "so they can work on the warm and fuzzy part—becoming humanized."

"It doesn't do us as much good to put money into print and tv ads like our competition. We put two-thirds of our money into direct mail."

To that end, IBM has pumped massive dollars into its "Tool for Modern Times" campaign for the IBM Personal Computer. The account is handled by Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein, New York. Although IBM will not disclose how much money going into advertising, accord to Leading National Advertise figures, IBM spent $3.6 million from January to September, 1982, to advertise its personal computer systems. Of that amount, $3.3 million went into magazines. Recently, Business Week estimated IBM will spend $13 million to advertise the personal computer on tv in 1983.

Whatever the advertising costs are, its hard to imagine a more universally human character than Charlie Chaplin's Little Tramp. In its ubiquitous tv and print ads for its product, IBM takes a Chaplin look-alike and depicts the Tramp in scenes reminiscent of the classic 1936 film "Modern Times," in which the character was comically overcome by the assembly line pace (see story on Page M-4).

"We see him as an Everyman," explains IBM spokesman Dan Scherer. "He's trying to cope, and we're trying to help."

Many ads are black & white except for one red rose, suggesting the Tramp's sentimental side and making the machine seem friendlier.

Like IBM, Texas Instruments uses a familiar face—comedian Bill Cosby. The company, which, according to Mr. Lim of Dataquest, was the No. 2 most frequent seller of below-$1,000 systems in 1982, chose him for a number of reasons.

"He has visibility and he relates to children well," says company representative Jon Campbell. "We emphasize the educational aspect of home computers, and Mr. Cosby fits in well since he actually has a doctorate in education."

The most visible spot for the campaign, created by McCann-Erickson, features Mr. Cosby talking on a phone and reacting to the news that TI is offering a $100 rebate on its home computer. He feigns astonishment—he wants to be sure about this stupendous offer. "That's $100 for the people," he says, mugging as he hasn't mugged since he got those kids to try Jell-O instant pudding.

In its multimedia campaign, Atari also stresses the educational potential of personal computers, showing children learning to speak French on a home system. Those spots ran during the ABC-TV spectacular "The Winds of War."

The dilemma for this Silicon Valley company—No. 3 seller in the below-$1,000 market—is unique: There's a Pac-Man on its back. A subsidiary of Warner Communications, Atari has been almost exclusively identified with videogames in the eyes of the public. "It's a problem," admits Atari ad manager Barry Ofstedal. "We need to create a distinct image for the Atari home computer apart from our videogames."

Wells, Rich, Greene has the home computer account.

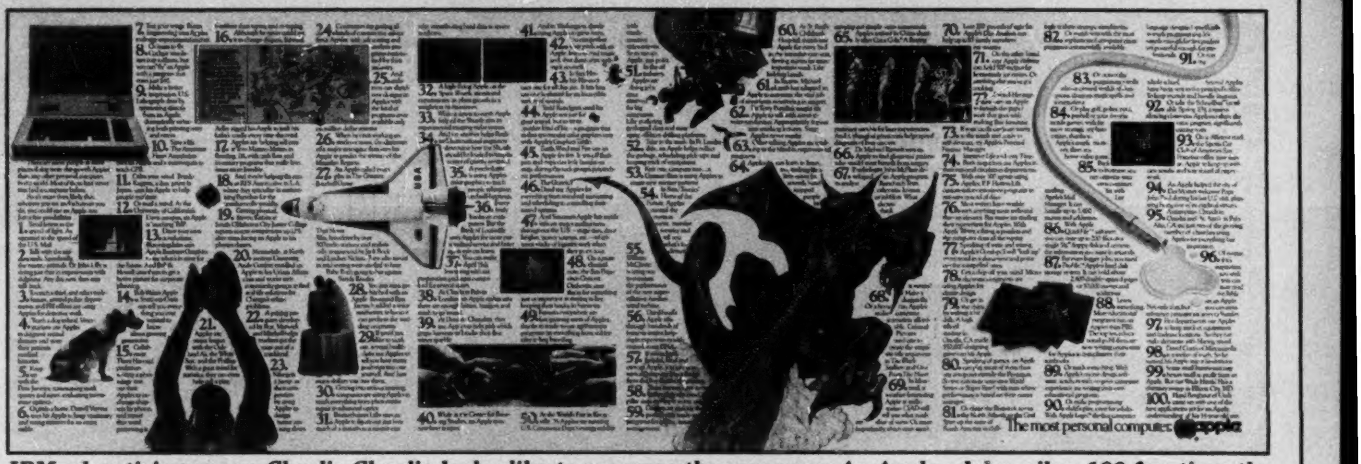
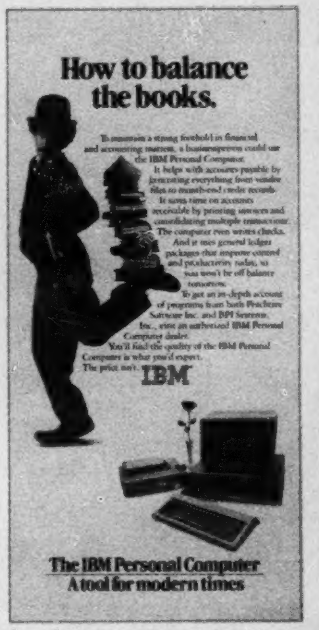
image in its advertising. Commodore, says Mr. Lim, is the No. 1 seller in the below-$1,000 market; it is easily the most combative of the big seven. Its print ads last fall struck right at the heart of Atari's problem. Its headline read: "A real computer for the price of a toy." The copy advised checking out the Commodore VIC-20 because "all of its games come in a different, more worthwhile package: A full-fledged computer."

"Yeah, we really went after those videogames-only machines," chuckles Hugh McCloy, the Commodore account executive at Ally & Gargano, New York.



The most personal computer. apple



How to balance the books.
IBM
The IBM Personal Computer
A tool for modern times

IBM advertising uses a Charlie Chaplin look-alike to reassure the consumer. An Apple ad describes 100 functions the Apple—"the most personal computer"—can perform, including correcting spelling, testing beer recipes, playing chess, and helping to understand a 14-year-old.

Commodore ads can get quite direct. In one short-lived tv spot, Mr. McCloy recalls, an Apple was consumed bite by bite as the narrator extolled the virtues of the Commodore.

And in tv spots this past winter, competitors' computers were asked to rate themselves against a Commodore and pick the better of the two. "Commodore," flashed an Apple screen. Then a voice, its tone slightly mocking: "That's what we like about our competition: It's so honest."

The third element that characterizes recent computer advertising—price—is represented by Commodore as well. In full-page newspaper ads this winter, the price-slashing efforts of Atari and TI were noted in the Commodore ads. "Even if they gave theirs away, the Commodore VIC-20 would still be a better computer," noted the headline.

In comparison, Tandy Corp.'s Radio Shack, makers of the TRS-80s, seems quiet. A leading maker of computers costing above and below $1,000, this direct retailer, with 6,500 outlets nationwide, has a different strategy. It handles advertising inhouse, and, according to John Shirley, vp of Radio Shack's computer division, some 9% of sales goes into spreading the word about TRS-80. But its not weighted toward tv and print.

"It doesn't do us as much good to put money into nice print and tv ads like our competition does. We put two-thirds of our money into direct mail."

Nevertheless, Radio Shack has run substantial print advertising, such as the magazine spread last fall, with science fiction writer Isaac Asimov endorsing the TRS-80. And before Christmas, the company ran numerous newspaper and tv ads whose message was, says Mr. Shirley, "price cut, price cut, price cut."

But when it comes to price cutting, Timex has entered a new dimension. The Timex/Sinclair 1000 has always been lowcost, retailing for $99.95, with an additional rebate of $15. Recently, however, it announced another price cut, to $54.95, including a $15 rebate. The reduction, according to a company official, was to assure Timex's role as the "price-value" leader in the home computer field.

The tiny computer was introduced last year in a $25 million-plus campaign orchestrated by J. Walter Thompson USA.

The ads, mostly in national magazines, show a 1000 emerging from a starburst between outstretched hands. The theme: "The power is within your reach." The message: Never mind that this is like a set of computer training wheels; you have to start somewhere if you want to become computer-literate. The low price is possible, the copy explains, because "as technology increases, price decreases. It happened to the calculator. It happened to the digital watch."

Indeed, there is precedent. Timex is performing for the computer the same egalitarian task it did for the wristwatch: Make it accessible to all but the destitute.

In Peter A McWilliams' "The Personal Computer Book," he writes of one tv commercial planned by Timex in which John Cameron Swayze stands at a firing range. A rifleman draws a bead on the Timex/Sinclair 1000, squeezes the trigger and sends chunks of high-tech plastic flying. The eager Mr. Swayze examines the remains, looks into the camera. "The Timex/Sinclair," he says, "takes a shooting but keeps on computing."

Now, although the Middlebury, Conn.-based company has not gone that far—as yet—what could be friendlier than a spot that harkens back to the age of "Ozzie and Harriet"?

Marketers benefit from added exposure

Foods like toying with tie-ins

By JAMES P. FORKAN

Food companies, especially in the candy and fast-food categories, seem to be the advertisers most taken with the idea of licensing their brand names and logos to toy and game companies.

Such marketers see this additional exposure as beneficial to their product visibility, while the toy makers feel that such brand names, backed by millions of ad dollars, are nearly as "presold" to the family audience as popular tv series characters—and in some cases more so.

Mattel Toys is introducing a Barbie Loves McDonald's playset later this year, as well as McDonald's uniforms as fashion accessories for its Barbie and Ken dolls. This will be the biggest toy license by a fast-food giant during 1983, but it will not be the first. A few years ago, Playskool marketed a McDonald's playset for preschoolers, and Hasbro Industries and others have at one time or other had Ronald McDonald and Burger King dolls on toy store shelves.

Mattel, whose BurgerTime hand-held electronic game is among prizes in a new McDonald's contest, also will be promoting Patterns by Simplicity for the Barbie Sew Perfect toy sewing machine; the Simplicity name is licensed from Simplicity Pattern Co.

Also coming from Mattel (through Mattel Electronics) this summer will be a batch of M Network videogame cartridges that will feature not only licensed cartoon characters like "Scooby Doo" but the Kool-Aid "pitcher man," a familiar figure in tv commercials and print ads for that General Foods product. According to Mattel, the idea of the Kool-Aid videogame, aimed at children four to nine, is that the youngsters must help the pitcher man "fight off the thirst-ees."

General Mills' Kenner Products, meanwhile, is introducing an addition to its toy-item line tied in with Betty Crocker, a brand name also owned by General Mills. The new Betty Crocker Easy-Bake Dual-Temp child's oven will be sold along with the customary accessory cake mix packets and new Strawberry Shortcake mixes.

Bachman Industries has linked up with a candy brand, Peter Paul Cadbury's PowerHouse. Tv, comics book and p.o.p. advertising will promote the PowerHouse electric train and layout, with the set featuring a train car emblazoned with the candy bar's logo and colored blue like the wrapper.

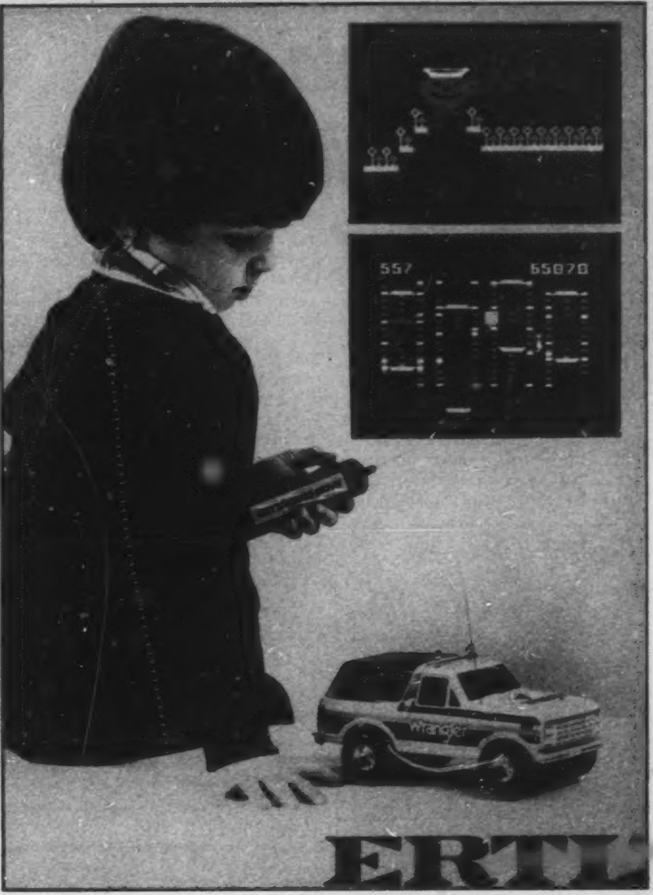
In another candy deal, Alvimar Mfg. Co. has licensed the Reese's Pieces name for a line of pool/beach inflatables—some of which will be shaped in the form of the candies and the packaging. In initial trade magazine advertising aimed at retailers, Alvimar called the line "extra-terr-iffic," obviously playing on the Hershey Foods brand's "E.T." movie tie-in.

Probably Ertl Co.'s most visible product introductions due late this year will be based on a tie-in, or "cross-sell promotion" as Ertl executives prefer to call it, with Blue Bell for the Wrangler jeans name. The 47-product Wrangler line will include a radio-controlled Wrangler Bronco vehicle, plus toy versions of a pickup truck, livestock hauler, helicopter and cars, plus action figures of the Wrangler man, woman and horses.

Still other toy companies with brand name products due on toy shelves include: Menasca Corp.'s Popsicle People activity sets, licensed from Popsicle Industries; Deka Plastics' mugs shaped like Pepsi-Cola cans to add to last year's successful Lifesavers mugs; A.R.C. and Talbot Toys impulse items featuring brand names like Hershey's, Reese's Pieces, Life Savers and Burger King; Processed Plastic Co.'s toy lawn mower using the Lawn-Boy brand name, and Mel Appel Co.'s ride-ons, children's tableware, activity sets and tote bags featuring Binney & Smith's Crayola name and logo (also licensed by Deka Plastics for toy storage sets).

Moreover, toy vehicle marketers like Mattel's Hot Wheels, Tomy and Matchbox tend to reflect the auto industry in miniature; some like Mattel's Hot Wheel feature both auto brands and advertiser brands, e.g., Pepsi-Cola Co.'s Mountain Dew on appropriate trucks. In at least some of those cases, said an agency executive after assuring his anonymity, auto companies allow toy companies to use their names without charge.

Then, too, there are a couple of companies that incorporate their own brand names in toy subsidiary's products. Atlanta Novelty features the Gerber baby doll (and the much-advertised baby logo), while Johnson & Johnson Child Development Toys feature the J&J script logo on packaging and on the toys themselves.#



Marketers are finding a "presold" sales area for tie-in products. Included are Ertl Co.'s link with Blue Bell's Wrangler jeans name on a Wrangler Bronco vehicle. From Mattel (insets) this summer will be M Network videogame cartridge tie-ins with the Kool-Aid "pitcher man" (top) from General Foods and BurgerTime (bottom), with McDonald's.

Parker presses Atari

ALEXANDRIA, VA.—Adversaries in the videogame software arena are fighting it out in court again, this time arguing whether Atari can induce independent game cartridge wholesale distributors to handle its product exclusively.

Parker Bros. filed a complaint seeking treble damages and a permanent injunction barring Atari from pursuing exclusive distributor arrangements.

A federal judge here issued a temporary restraining order against the Warner Communications subsidiary. But later, U.S. district court Judge Albert Bryan denied a request for a preliminary injunction (AA, April 4). Parker Bros. said it will move forward with its lawsuit.

Atari, which has filed several patent infringement suits recently, has embarked on a new strategy to convince distributors to handle its software alone, apparently aimed at protecting its slipping, but still dominant, share of the software market.

Parker Bros. alleged in its complaint that distributors were given a March 31 deadline to drop non-Atari software product lines or else Atari "threatened to cut them off."

At least 26 of the nearly 100 major distributors, through whose organizations 55% of game cartridges are sold, agreed to Atari's plan, Parker Bros. said.

Parker Bros., marketer of the blockbuster Frogger game plus the successful "Star Wars"-licensed cartridge, said those 26 companies handle 49% of its independent distributor volume and 31% of its software sales. Parker Bros. said order cancelations from independent distributors topped $2 million between March 22 and 24 and $15 million during a one-month period.

Parker Bros. said the Atari practice, which it alleged violates antitrust laws and is an attempt to monopolize the software market, will squeeze it not only in distribution, but inhibit its ability to attract game designers.

Sunnyvale, Cal.-based Atari confirmed it had been "pursuing exclusive distributorship agreements."#

Her side

A bitter Luisi tells how JWT scandal blew up in her face

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

New York—Marie Luisi, the deposed former head of syndication and spot tv sales at J. Walter Thompson Co., called in the press last week to charge that the agency totally lacked financial controls, imposed heavy pressure for increased profits, inflated program costs to clients to pump up its bottom line and has continued to use its time bank despite last year's earnings writeoff.

In papers served on JWT's counsel—but not yet filed in court—Ms. Luisi also accused her former agency of committing a host of sins against her, including defamation of her reputation and character and intentional infliction of emotional distress. She named five key JWT executives in the suit (AA, April 11). According to the papers, she will ask the New York state supreme court for $49.3 million in compensatory and $76 million in punitive damages, or a total of $125.3 million.

Sitting in her attorney's office, she paints a picture of a woman who started as a secretary and managed to climb through the corporate ranks, who struggled unsuccessfully for years to correct serious management problems in the giant corporation and who was ultimately crushed by that corporation when it became ensnared by its "lack of adequate financial controls."

Her attorney, Ivan Fisher, said last week that he is considering amending the papers to include as a defendant Price Waterhouse, longtime auditors for JWT. Already named are Don Johnston, chairman-chief executive officer, and Herbert Eames, exec vp-chief financial officer of JWT Group, parent company of J. Walter Thompson Co. Also named are Burt Manning, chairman; Victor Gutierrez, senior vp-treasurer, and Robert Buchanan, exec vp-director of U.S. media, J. Walter Thompson USA. A "John Doe" and "John Roe" are added to cover any possible future actions. The papers were delivered to JWT counsel

Donkey Kong latest in kids' cereal rebirth

By JANET NEIMAN

After years of concentrating on adult and family cereals stressing health and diet, cereal marketers are rediscovering kids.

In an attempt to insure trial, many of the new products are based on and use names and characters licensed from other fields, such as videogames, movies, cartoons and tv shows.

The latest entry is Donkey Kong cereal from Ralston Purina Co., based on the popular videogame and licensed from Nintendo of America. The product, a presweetened cereal shaped like the barrels seen in the videogame, will go head to head with Pac-Man cereal from General Mills (AA, Feb. 28), licensed from Bally/Midway Mfg.

St. Louis-based Ralston is introducing Donkey Kong into selected markets, probably as part of a phased national rollout. Those markets include Kansas City, where Pac-Man is already testing. Donkey Kong is described as tasting similar to Quaker's Cap'n Crunch.

New children's cereals have come from almost every major cereal marketer except Kellogg recently.

- General Foods' Post unit has rolled out Smurf-Berry Crunch, which is being backed by $19 million in advertising and promotion, and Strawberry HoneyComb, a line extension of its Honeycomb brand.
- General Mills over the past two years has introduced Donutz and Chocolate Donutz cereals, as well as its Strawberry Shortcake cereal, licensed by American Greetings' Those Characters from Cleveland. That one apparently spurred GF into action on its two new items; the Donutz item ran up against Ralston's own Dinky Donuts.
- Quaker Oats has reintroduced Halfsies cereal, presweetened half with sugar and half with G.D. Searle & Co.'s aspartame, and has just begun testing ChocoCrunch, a

Clients are behind them, agencies say

Buyers resist net prices

By CRAIG REISS

New York—Agency media directors, backed by what they say is mounting client resolve to resist hefty network upfront rate increases next month, are preparing to call the networks' bluff on several key negotiating issues.

Media directors and agency network negotiators argue the network contention that the Olympic Games and national election will reduce the available network inventory in 1984, thereby increasing competition for the remaining ad time, is overstated and possibly could have a reverse effect on pricing.

Furthermore, the agency spokesmen contend that clients are prepared to resist any price increase that goes far above the national inflation rate. The advertisers maintain that it would be difficult to pass along the network price increases to the consumer while inflation is low.

Gene DeWitt, exec vp-U.S. media director at McCann-Erickson, has issued a recommendation to his agency's clients to divert as much as 100% of any network upfront price increase above an acceptable rate of inflation to an alternate tv network (see related story, Page 53).

Mr. DeWitt, who was the first to applaud this year's spate of ad hoc network proposals, wrote in a memorandum to McCann clients, "We recommend that any excessive inflation the networks build into their rates be met with a corresponding reduction in the portion of an advertiser's national tv ad budget allocated to the

About 500 Marlboro cowboys around the country are doing a silent selling job for the world's best-selling cigaret. The unusual 12-by-20-ft. lighted vertical displays consist of one of three poses of a determined Marlboro man with his saddle. Philip Morris USA said the displays are being used along secondary roads and in inner-city locations, as well as 50 minor league baseball parks around the country.

Following FTC decision on B&W's 1mg-tar claim

Barclay back to square 1

Washington—The Federal Trade Commission issued a notice last week that it will no longer permit Brown & Williamson Tobacco to cite government testing data as a basis for the 1mg tar rating claim for its heavily promoted Barclay cigaret. There was no immediate word from Louisville-based B&W indicating whether changes in its ads will follow.

The announcement confronts B&W with unappetizing choices. One would be to defy FTC and invite a formal complaint and hearing, thus—at a minimum—buying additional time for the 1mg claim.

Other alternatives, all fatal to the 1mg rating, have already been proposed by FTC.

In briefs filed in federal courts, FTC promised to be "flexible," offering B&W three alternatives: Omit any reference to tar and nicotine from Barclay ads; simply claim "low tar," or use an estimated yield of 3mg-to-7mg tar.

As it had earlier, in its preliminary announcement, FTC repeated that it is eyeing other B&W brands. It has determined, FTC said, "that there is a significant likelihood that the current testing method does not assess accurately Brown & Williamson's Kool Ultra and Kool Ultra 100s, each of which uses the Actron filter."

The notice also invited comment on a long list of questions looking toward changes in testing procedures. Some were technical, relating to the equipment itself. Others were motivational. For example, FTC asked: "What evidence is there that smokers use 'higher' tar cigarets differently than lower 'tar' cigarets?" "Should the commission explore a system of categories or 'bands' of 'tar' content rather than specific numerical estimates?" "Should consumers be advised that the cigarets' actual 'tar' delivery depends on how it is smoked?"

By the weekend, B&W was still refusing to go beyond saying that "it intends to cooperate fully" and that it "has requested a meeting." The company expressed satisfaction, however, that FTC specifically said it was not implying that B&W had violated the law for its past reliance on the test data, and it indicated satisfaction that FTC was proposing a revised listing system using "bands" of "tar" instead of numerical estimates.

B&W noted that a Swiss court recently dismissed charges by Philip Morris Inc. that would have prevented the sale of Barclay in Switzerland using the 1mg claim, and it predicted its claims will be supported when all the evidence is in.

Commission lawyers began examining their options the week before last, after learning that they had been given the green light to act by a three-judge federal appeals

Tv is hurting us, say USFL execs

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

A rift has developed between United States Football League commissioner Chet Simmons and some league marketing directors over the impact of tv exposure on the fledgling league's ticket sales.

Although the marketing executives know that Mr. Simmons' ability to come up with an ABC/ESPN tv package was essential to the development of team and player identities, they believe the USFL's "no blackout" rule in its 12 cities has led to steadily declining ticket sales. Mr. Simmons disagrees and has told club owners they must develop more aggressive marketing plans.

The USFL's contract with ABC-TV does not require the broadcast network to cover all four Sunday contests each week. ABC is obligated to carry a single game each Sunday, but often has carried more. On five of the six Sundays of this first USFL season, ABC has televised two games regionally. Entertainment & Sports Programming

Season ends, but nets can't let up

By JAMES P. FORKAN

New York—The 1982-83 prime time season was declared over as of Sunday, April 17, but for the affiliates the battle rages on through the May sweeps.

Local stations regard the May rating sweeps period—spanning April 27 through May 24 in the Arbitron Ratings Co. book and April 28 through May 25 in A.C. Nielsen Co.'s—as the most important of the four sweeps periods. Stations must live with these ratings' data for pricing purposes not only throughout the summer but until the November sweeps. (The other sweeps periods are February and July.)

Thus the tv networks are forced to save special programing for their affiliates' benefit instead of airing them during the official tv season

This time, however, the networks may be helping themselves, what with their second-quarter sales picture (and spot) on the soft side.

As the season wound down, ABC delivered one more blockbuster, the 3½-hour live Academy Awards telecast on April 11. That got ABC off to a strong start in the season's 29th and final week, registering a 38 homes rating and a 59 audience share, its highest Nielsens since 1972. The Oscarcast averaged more than 31.6 million homes an average minute, also a record, and ABC claimed the event drew 90 million

Weekly set as spinoff of 'Post'

Washington—The Washington Post, resuming the launch countdown for its tabloid National Weekly Edition, is projecting a fall rollout. But circulation specifics, ad rates, even the exact grade of premium newsprint that will be used, are still iffy.

The project has been on hold since January. Now two key execs from the editorial and ad staffs of the daily paper have been assigned fulltime, and plans are afoot for a fulltime sales rep in New York. The immediate appointees are Charles Hollingsworth, associated with the project from the outset (AA, Oct. 25), to business manager and ad director, and Noel Epstein to editor.

Mr. Hollingsworth had been corporate and financial ad sales manager of the daily Post, and business manager of its weekly Washington Business tab insert.

Mr. Epstein had been managing editor of "Outlook," the Sunday Post's commentary and opinion section.

Circulation expectations for the proposed tabloid—which will reprint articles on politics, the federal government and the economy from the daily and Sunday Post—was put at an imprecise "well

Hardy shops weather economic storms

Gross income in 1982 rises a robust 27% over 1981

By Dennis Chase

The world's advertising agencies, battered in 1982 by devaluations and a deep recession, still managed to rack up strong growth in gross income.

ADVERTISING AGE'S Foreign Agency Income Survey of 862 agencies in 74 countries—the largest such survey in this publication's history—shows that gross income last year grew 27% to $4.2 billion from $3.3 billion in 1981, restated at 1982 exchange rates.

Japan's Dentsu Inc. maintained its position as the world's largest advertising agency, with a gross income of $402.9 million—a rise of 7% over 1981. That is better than its 6% growth in 1981 over 1980, but still far from the days when Dentsu and other Japanese agencies routinely registered growth rates in the double-digits. This year Japanese agencies grew only on average 6.5% in billings, compared with 8.2% in 1981.

The second largest agency in the world remains Young & Rubicam, with a gross income of $376.6 million, edging closer to Dentsu compared with last year. For the second year, the new joint venture agency, Dentsu-Young & Rubicam, is listed among Japanese agencies and, for the first year, among Malaysian ones.

Acquisitions played a large part in realigning the top 10 world agency list this year. Ted Bates Worldwide leaped into the No. 3 slot from No. 6, with $356.1 million in gross income, following its purchase of William Esty Co. last year.

Another big change is the emergence of Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide as the ninth largest agency in the world, with a gross income of $186.5 million. Last year Compton Advertising in the U.S. was the 16th largest agency, and Saatchi & Saatchi in the U.K. was 30th. The new combined agency replaces SSC&B:Lintas Worldwide, part of the Interpublic Group of Cos., on the list; it fell to 12th place behind Doyle Dane Bernbach and Foote, Cone & Belding.

Several large agencies declined to report this year, including Japan's Tokyu Advertising, which was No. 33 last year; Mainosyhtymae Oy, last year's largest agency in Finland, and Publicidad Ferrer, last year's second largest agency in Mexico. They gave no reason.

In Britain, Saatchi & Saatchi continued its hot streak by growing 31% in gross income last year, far outpacing U.S. multinational agencies, including its leading contender for the top slot, J. Walter Thompson, which grew 11%. Other U.S. agencies did well, including Ogilvy & Mather, which grew 19% and moved into the No. 6 spot from No. 9 last year, Leo Burnett Co., which grew 32%, and Young & Rubicam Holdings, which grew 22%.

One casualty, however, was the McCann Group, which slipped 14% but held the No. 4 spot, although by a slim margin.

In Paris, the big winner was Doyle Dane Bernbach & Peyrat Paternot Garnier, which grew 36% and jumped from No. 18 to No. 8. Publicis Conseil lengthened its lead over No. 2 rival Havas Conseil Group.

Once the "engine" of Europe for U.S. advertisers, Germany slipped considerably last year. While it still is the fourth largest advertising market in the world, its lead over the fifth largest, France, is fading. Gross income for all agencies in Germany grew only 3% last year and is not expected to grow at all this year. Most German agencies decreased the number of employes dramatically last year.

The McCann-Erickson Group was the biggest U.S. casualty, again in Germany, with gross income falling 3%, slipping a notch from second to third place on the rankings behind Team/BBDO Group, which grew 5%. Also hard hit was FCB-Deutschland Kommunikations, with gross income falling 23% and its agency ranking slipping from No. 11 to No. 19, partly because of the loss of the worldwide British Airways account.

U.S. agencies generally did well in Australia, where the biggest change is the disappearance of the Fortune Group of Cos., formerly the No. 3 agency. It lost the worldwide Cathay Pacific airlines account to Leo Burnett Co. What remains of the Fortune group is now part of Dancer Fitzgerald Sample—a new agency formed this year that should break into the top 10 rankings next year largely because it has won the Toyota Motor Sales account. George Patterson agency, 80% owned by Ted Bates, continues to be the leader.

In other major markets a tough business climate caused shifts in the leaders. In South Africa, Grey Advertising, by growing 74% in gross income, overtook BBDO, which grew 37%, as the leading agency. In Canada, J. Walter Thompson Co., grew 32%, taking the lead from a Canadian agency, Foster Advertising, which grew 7%.

In Brazil, where local agencies dominate the market, MPM Propaganda is in danger of losing its long-held lead to Alcantara Machado, Periscinoto Comunicacoes, which grew faster.

Foreign currency rates

Exchange rates in these tables were applied to both 1982 and 1981 local currency figures for each agency. This seems to provide a more accurate assessment of an agency's year-to-year income and billings growth than applying different exchange rates for each year.

The use of different rates for each year would make an agency's growth dependent on the foreign exchange market (which has been particularly volatile in 1982), thereby eliminating its true growth as shown by its local currency performance.

For example, if a French agency had billings of FF100,000 in 1982 and FF80,000 in 1981, the system of applying the same exchange rate of 0.1528 to both years would give the agency U.S. dollar equivalents of $15,280 and $12,224, respectively, indicating a growth in dollars as well as francs of 25%. However, if 1981's annual exchange rate of 0.1858 were applied to FF80,000, the dollar equivalent would be $14,864, or only an increase in dollar growth of 3%.

Because of particularly severe currency fluctuations in Argentina (−79%) and Brazil (−48%), it was decided not to show the percentage of increase or decrease in gross income for the two years, because that would not give a true picture.

The rates listed in the table are average annual rates of exchange. Local currency figures for 1982 are supplied in the charts.

How to 'play the angles' and win

Promotion planners are getting smarter. That's the main point that evolved from our evaluation of over 6,900 different promotions run in 1982.

The fsi or fsci—or just plain free-standing insert—continued to emerge during 1982 as the fastest growing coupon delivery vehicle. According to the Dancer Fitzgerald Sample's "Promotion Review," a monthly market-by-market report of promotion activities in 24 major categories, the free-standing insert, representing 33% of all coupons delivered, increased its share of usage by 75% in 1982, clearly making it the second most popular couponing technique behind run-of-press newspaper coupons.

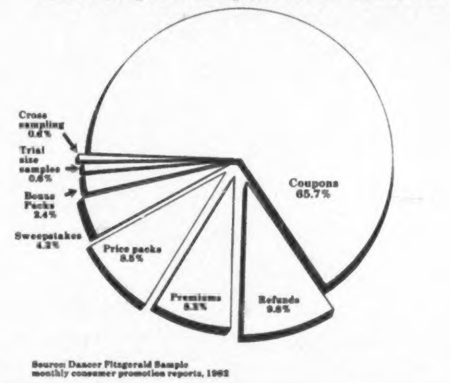
The continued growth of the free-standing insert is but one of several changes that developed during 1982, a year in which several trends recognized in 1981 continued to play important roles in manufacturers' promotional plans. Each trend represents a much wiser use of promotion techniques than previously seen.

Here are the highlights found in a review of 6,970 different programs in all media and retail outlets (point of sale/on-package) in 24 different product categories in six major U.S. markets.

- Media-delivered coupons. As already noted, fsi accounted for a third of all media-delivered coupons in 1982 (the addition of a Best Foods Day fsi should increase this number significantly during 1983). In addition, we found a substantial increase in the use of magazines as a couponing vehicle. The reason for this is not clear, but perhaps the magazine co-op couponing vehicles, like thematics, are beginning to establish themselves as an efficient method for attractively delivering a coupon to targeted consumers.
- On-pack coupons. The instant coupon continues to be used as an immediate reward device. We found a 70% increase in its use in the past year. Also, the on-pack coupon, because of its efficient delivery costs, continues to be more popular than the in-pack coupon.
- Refunds. The use of coupons in place of cash for media-delivered refunds continues to grow. Marketers simply see the great value in offering larger monetary savings at less cost (the coupons come back in sales) through multiple coupon refunds. On the other hand, cash, because of its brand-switching appeal, continued to be the most popular on-package refund offer, which certainly makes a lot of sense.

1982 summary of promotions

Based on 6,970 promotions reported over a 12-month period



Source: Dancer Fitzgerald Sample monthly consumer promotion reports, 1982

- Sweepstakes/games. Perhaps it's during the difficult economic times when consumers look to hit a sudden jackpot or search for dream vacations to transport them from everyday problems to paradise. In any case, sweepstakes and their new exciting offshoot, games, seem to have become increasingly popular in 1982. In the review, we found a 40% increase in the use of sweepstakes and games over the previous year.

Games in particular have made a real impact on the product package because they can be used to create excitement and brand switching opportunities at the point-of-sale. We found a 24% increase in their use in 1982 vs. 1981. The question now is whether the market is being saturated with games and consumers will become leary of them. Only time will tell.

As in 1981, the top prizes for sweepstakes and games depended on the media used to present the production. When delivered in print media, cash and vacations ranked equally as high as top prizes, with automobiles a very distant third. However, again as in 1981, cash, the motivating brand switcher, ranks No. 1 as an on-package prize inducement.

- Premiums. The most significant finding in 1982 was the growing request by marketers for postage and handling money when offering free-in-mail premiums in both media and on the package. We understand that this change hasn't made a bit of difference in the consumer's response, as long as the number of proofs required is realistic.

As reported last year, self-liquidators, the premium that thrives in dire economic times (it costs nothing) and which is an excellent dealer loader for gaining displays, continued to be heavily used.

- Price packs/bonus packs. Here again, the economic environment breeds certain types of promotions. The bonus pack, which offers consumers more free products, was up 14% over 1981.

What does this all mean? Simply that the people planning promotions are beginning to "play the angles" better. In most of the areas discussed, attempts toward smarter use of promotion planning were evident. Marketers are being cleverer in using their promotion funds to create more efficient and effective impact with consumers. That's progress.

By Rance Crain

I'm not sure which slogan is more insistent—"Coke is It!" or "Pepsi Now!" But I do know Pepsi-Cola's latest effort will do nothing to slow the momentum of the Coke campaign.

Pepsi has been hoisted by its own petard. After all, it invented the emotional pitch glorifying the consumers who gulp down the product. Ever since the "Pepsi Generation" ads started more than 20 years ago, Pepsi built momentum with well executed variations of the theme.

I am an unabashed and unapologetic exponent of consistency. BBDO, Pepsi's agency, has stayed with "Ring around the collar" through thick and thin for Wisk liqquid and made it the biggest selling detergent in the entire Unilever empire, but what do you do if someone else comes in and does a better job at your own game?

The only thing you can do, it seems to me, is to switch strategies or else run the risk of being drowned in a sea of soda suds. Seven-Up, when it was bought by Philip Morris Inc., tried the emotional appeal with "America is turning 7UP" but got nowhere until it started playing up the product-oriented, no-caffeine approach.

Now, I note, Coca-Cola's own Sprite, the 7UP lookalike, has adopted a no-caffeine tag to its tv commercials.

Pepsi, of course, does have one very effective tactical weapon in its arsenal—the "Pepsi Challenge" promotion. Coke has never figured out how to handle that particular onslaught, and the "Challenge" ads drove the boys from Atlanta bananas. Pepsi could—and should—play that card on a hit-and-run basis until it can come up with another long-range strategy to replace "Pepsi Generation."

I'm not in any way minimizing the enormousness of that task, but I don't see any alternative. The Pepsi flagship brand is very vulnerable right now, and the new campaign is even worse and less memorable than the previous "Pepsi's got your taste for life." I noticed that after the "Taste for life" tv commericals hit the airwaves, they didn't get heavy play after a while; maybe both Pepsi and its bottlers were embarrassed by their lack of punch and direction, although the "Taste" theme actually makes sense.

But Pepsi probably won't change its course of action and will keep trying to conjure up ever more heart-tugging vignettes and pulse-pounding music. There are big egos involved here, remember. Phil Dusenberry, who was profiled in these pages several weeks ago, is the kingpin on the Pepsi account at BBDO, and his former boss John Bergin is the honcho at McCann-Erickson, Coke's agency.

We quoted Mr. Bergin as saying he thought the Pepsi "Taste for life" stuff was "kind of pallid" next to "Coke is It!" "I've said it over and over again—Phil Dusenberry is better than that."

John Bergin, evidently, is very good at goading his old employe into trying to surpass the Coke campaign. And maybe he will—but not by resurrecting the tired images and emotional cliches of yesteryear.

The "Pepsi Challenge" ads show that Pepsi has one whopping advantage over Coca-Cola—taste. The ads probably inspired Burger King to mount a challenge of its own against McDonald's, and its "Flame-broiling vs. frying" comparison created a short-run sensation.

But now the biggest challenge facing both Pepsi-Cola and Burger King is to translate the tactical advantages won by the "Challenge" and "flame-broiling" promotional thrusts into permanent advances. It won't be easy: They have both allowed their chief competitors to gather a momentum that will be hard to reverse.

Leo Burnett USA's McDonald's campaign wears well and seems to be building—I especially like the one where the guy can't make up his mind what to order. And, similarly, "Coke is It!" goes down easy; I always enjoy hearing the jingle, but then I still like the Royal pudding radio jingle of 30 years ago ("Rich rich rich with flavor, smooth smooth smooth as silk. More food energy than sweet fresh milk."). Which I note they are half-way reviving for tv commercials.

The message for Pepsi-Cola, then, is clear: It's time to start saying something about the product and not just about the people who drink it.

Tv viewers pick the top 25 campaigns of 1982
How the 'Winds of War' scored big with audiences

Travel and Tourism: There's still a market for a week at the shore. There's also a market for a hike in Asia, a body-building program in California and two weeks with a tin cup and a tarp anywhere. The travel market has changed dramatically over the years. And the travel industry is running (jogging?) fast to keep up with it all.

What were the most remembered television campaigns of 1982? Each year for the past six years, Video Storyboard Tests has sampled groups of tv viewers to find out what commercials they recall from their tv watching. Many of this year's 25 are favorites from earlier years, but this year some some new commercials joined the lineup.

Tv spending in '82 soars to $9.5 billion

By CRAIG REISS

NEW YORK—Tv advertising spending in 1982 topped $9.5 billion, a gain of $1.1 billion, or 13.4%, over the 1981 level.

Home electronics and computer advertisers registered the biggest percentage increases in tv ad spending at 302% and 245%, respectively, while food and food products continued as the largest single tv advertising category at $1.6 billion.

These findings come from the latest Broadcast Advertisers Reports data, as analyzed by the Television Bureau of Advertising.

Among the top 100 tv advertisers, 17 showed a decline in total tv ad spending. Eight others registered little or no increases in spending, while 75 increased their tv ad budgets 5% or more.

The biggest individual increase in tv spending came from the National Enquirer, which, according to the TvB/BAR data, spent 2,587.6% more in tv in '82 than in '81. Most of the increase resulted from the launch of a network tv campaign that TvB/BAR estimated at $27.5 million.

Among the top 20 tv advertisers, the only ones showing spending declines were General Foods, down 7.6% to $301.2 million, and Bristol-Myers, down 2.6%. Bristol-Myers, however, denies the accuracy of the BAR figures, stating instead that its tv spending last year was up about 10%.

Warner Communications, sparked by the heavy spending of its Atari subsidiary, showed a 68% increase to $107.4 million, moving up to 20th place in tv advertisers. Of the top 20 tv advertisers, Anheuser-Busch had the next-highest percentage increase last year, rising 36.1% to $143.1 million.

Network tv spending was up 11.4%, reaching total spending of $6.2 billion. The increase was slightly below the percentage increase in network tv prices in general, although these ad rates fluctuated greatly and the largest increases were realized for only the second half of the year.

National, regional and local spot tv advertising rose about $500 million, or 17.4%, to $3.3 billion. The increase came despite decreases in spot tv spending by 20 of the top 100 tv advertisers. In network tv, 28 of the top 100 also cut their budgets from the '81 figure.

In computer-advertiser spending, IBM registered the largest tv ad budget (its computers alone) last year at $19.7 million, more than doubling the '81 level. Commodore was second at $14.1 million, with Atari's computer division third at $11.6 million.

Other categories showing major increases in spending were air freight, up 107% to $64.3 million; travel, hotels and resorts, up 52% to $194.2 million, and publishing and media, up 46% to $172.9 million.

In addition to the National Enquirer, four other advertisers were new to the top 100 list: Coleco Industries, $25.1 million; Dr Pepper, $22.3 million; MGM/UA Entertainment, $21.8 million, and Cosmair, $21.5 million.#

JWT knew in '78: Luisi

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

NEW YORK—J. Walter Thompson Co. executives were alerted to problems in the giant agency's syndication unit as far back as 1978.

According to a series of memos that date back to that year, top JWT management from chairman Don Johnston down through the executive suites and the financial, legal and the media departments, were being made aware of financial problems in the unit and were supposedly working on solutions—solutions that never came.

Instead, there came the day in February, 1982, when JWT announced that it had uncovered "accounting irregularities" in its syndication unit. It would later write off $30 million in pretax earnings, restate revenues for the years 1979-1982, suspend and ultimately fire Marie Luisi, the senior vp who headed its spot-buying and syndication operation, and shut down its syndication unit all together.

Ms. Luisi is now planning to sue the agency for $125.3 million in punitive and compensatory damages, claiming defamation of character, among other things (AA, April 18). JWT terms her suit "ludicrous" and has vowed to countersue. But beyond scoffing at the suit, the agency has declined to comment further on syndication. The agency spokesman on the case last week called the entire matter "a bore."

Ms. Luisi, meanwhile, agreed to show ADVERTISING AGE documents that she believes will bolster her argument that JWT management was fully aware of what was going on and that she was made its scapegoat in order to cover up management mistakes.

In the brownstone building that houses the offices of her attorney, Ivan Fisher, Ms. Luisi brought out memos that reveal a picture of lack of administrative and financial controls, lack of direction and even serious conflict problems within the syndication area.

The documents show that for the past several years, JWT executives were not oblivious to the problems that ultimately resulted in that $30 million writeoff. In an Oct. 17, 1978, memo from Marie

Coke to debut caffeine-free

ATLANTA—Coca-Cola Co.'s long-awaited introduction of caffeine-free Coke, Tab and Diet Coke is planned for mid-May in Denver, Salt Lake City and another market, possibly San Francisco.

A spokesman for the soft-drink market leader would not confirm that its caffeine-free introduction was imminent.

From other sources, however, it was learned that Coca-Cola officials expect to move the new products into other markets as quickly as possible after the mid-May debut.

They reportedly plan to position the new entries as line extensions in order to avoid the cannibalization of the company's main cola drinks. Reports say the advertising planned by Coke will be low-key, in contrast to the company's big, brassy Diet Coke ad extravaganza.

This move comes as competition between Coke and Pepsi heated up on other fronts last week: Pepsi-Cola USA approved a 50% level of high-fructose corn syrup as a sucrose replacement in Pepsi and Pepsi Free regular, and Coca-Cola told of plans to introduce Diet Coke to the foodservice industry, also in May.

The subdued approach on the company's caffeine-free entries is

Network execs worry about audience decline

Big fall lineup shifts seen

By DIANE MERMIGAS and JAMES P. FORKAN

Executives of the three tv networks acknowledge that an unusual rating and share decline this past season in many returning shows could result in considerable across-the-board changes next fall, instead of the status-quo approach embraced this past season.

John Severino, president, ABC Television, said his network was hurt significantly by the National Football League players' strike last fall, which allowed CBS "to get off to a stronger start than they would have had." ABC's late-season mini-series strength was not enough to make up the difference—it lost the season to CBS by half a rating point—and the network's weak series on Thursday and Friday didn't help.

Donald (Bud) Grant, president, CBS Entertainment, said his network's solid series backbone is responsible for its narrow victory over ABC in prime time. However, Mr. Grant conceded that even CBS' Sunday night lineup, perhaps the most indomitable anywhere on tv, will receive an infusion of new series blood next fall.

Brandon Tartikoff, NBC Entertainment president, said the season offered some important rebuilding

D'Arcy resigns $6 million of Heublein business

HARTFORD, CONN.—D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius/New York has resigned $6 million worth of Heublein business, effective immediately. DM&M, a Heublein agency since 1968, had handled Harvey's Bristol Cream sherry and Don Q rum. Heublein said the agency cited continuing differences. No word yet on a new agency.

Sales of 1 million make 'USA Today' 3rd-largest

WASHINGTON—USA Today sales will exceed 1.1 million copies daily, cracking the million mark for the first time, in a new Price Waterhouse circulation report that was due for release during the weekend, a senior official said Friday. The Gannett exec said USA Today's average daily sales, audited from April 11 to 15, makes it the nation's third-biggest weekday paper, behind the Wall Street Journal and the New York Daily News, based on Sept. 30, 1982, ABC figures. The audit week coincided with the paper's rollout in the New York area, bringing the number of USA Today market "clusters" to 15.

France's Univas again eyes U.S., talks with DFS

By PHILLIP HILL

PARIS—Eurocom, the agency arm of the giant, state-owned Havas group, is expected to reenter the U.S. market in the next two months. Its first such venture was the disastrous acquisition of Kelly, Nason in 1977 by Univas, Eurocom's international agency group.

The prospective target is Dancer Fitzgerald Sample. Eurocom is about to open top-level talks with DFS, with which Eurocom already has a joint agency in France—Bazaine. Michel Morel, chairman of Bazaine, said that it had not yet been decided if the talks would take place in Paris or New York, and he claimed the talks only concerned their joint operations in France.

Other DFS executives, however, confirm the talks will go beyond France, although they deny there is any chance of a DFS takeover by Eurocom. DFS would benefit from a tie with Eurocom since its presence in Europe is not particularly strong.

Andre Rousselet, the recently appointed chairman of Havas, has said Eurocom's move into the U.S. is a No. 1 priority and that he would be prepared to pay more than the planned $13.75 million for an "entry ticket" to the U.S. The group probably has nearer to $27.5 million at its disposal in ready cash, according to one source.

The main reason for a move into the U.S. is pressure from internationally minded French clients who want to expand their presence in the market, but want to use a French rather than a U.S. agency.

Until recently, the odds-on favorite as this entry ticket was Bozell & Jacobs. According to one U.S. agency source in Paris, B&J was asking too much, even for Eurocom—$35 million for a 40% stake. Negotiations are believed to

DHL delivers big ad push

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

The highly competitive parcel-delivery business has a formidable new player.

DHL Corp., a unit of DHL Worldwide Courier Express Network Ltd., has unleashed a $10 million-plus awareness campaign in the U.S. The campaign coincides with the previously low-key company's major domestic expansion of its document and small-parcel courier express business. That business is designed to complement what has been primarily an international operation.

The DHL campaign, created by Ted Bates Advertising/New York, uses testimonials from such well-known Americans as cable entrepreneur-sportsman Ted Turner, market researcher A.C. Nielsen Jr., catalog mogul Roger Horchow, attorney Louis Nizer and publisher John Fairchild.

The U.S. operation, based in San Bruno, Cal., is one of two separate entities of the privately held DHL Worldwide Courier Express Network. The other—and much larger—is DHL International Ltd., based in Hong Kong. Industry sources estimate the two companies had combined sales of $400 million in 1982. The network serves 85 countries and handled more than 10 million shipments in 1982.

DHL Corp. just enlarged its air and ground fleets with the purchase of three Boeing 727-100Cs and seven Learjets, which are being added to the existing fleet of turboprop aircraft. CBS wins prime time race in photo finish

By DIANE MERMIGAS

The 1982-83 network tv season's prime time photo finish, with CBS edging out ABC by half a rating point, was overshadowed by new evidence that more Americans are using their tv sets, but a declining number have them tuned to the networks.

The 1% increase in hut (households using tv) levels to 63.5% in 1982-83 over the previous season was a small but significant testament to the fact that more consumers are watching more nonnetwork shows as well as using tv-related technologies like videocassette and videodisc players, videogames and home computers.

The hut increase could not be attributed to network viewing since the three networks' combined rating dropped 2% from last season, to 51, and the combined network share declined 3% to 80.4. The networks' delivery per average minute declined 100,000 households from last season, to a total of about 42.4 million.

When the dust finally settled last week, A.C. Nielsen Co. found the networks fixed in nearly the same positions they held at the end of the 1981-82 season.

CBS lead the prime time pack for the fourth consecutive season, averaging an 18.2 rating, 28.7 share in the 1982-83 prime time race which ended April 17. CBS stood up to ABC's late-season miniseries strength primarily with its regularly scheduled series and movies. ABC averaged a 17.7/27.9, and NBC a 15.1/23.8. NBC sustained its rating while the other two networks declined slightly over the previous season, which CBS ended with a 19/30.3, ABC with an 18.1/28.8 and NBC with a 15.2/24.2.

The significance of the continued close contest between CBS and ABC is that a single prime time network rating point advantage is worth 833,000 tv households and about $51 million in annual revenue. A rating is the percentage of tv households, and share is the percentage of homes with tv sets tuned in.

CBS won 19 of the season's 29 weeks, while ABC won seven (on the strength of such programs as "Winds of War," "Thorn Birds" and the Academy Awards) and NBC won three (on the appeal of the World Series and the Super Bowl).

CBS claimed an even greater victory over ABC in season averages of regular prime

Kellogg Co. rolls Crispix

By JAN[illegible] NEIMAN

Ralston Purina's Chex cereal line will be put under more pressure as Kellogg Co. expands its Crispix cereal into new markets.

Crispix is moving into the northeastern U.S., plus Denver, Phoenix and Seattle, following what the company called "very, very encouraging response" in its test markets of Chicago, Los Angeles and San Francisco (AA, Jan. 10).

Crispix has been seen, as one industry analyst put it, as a means of "getting back at Ralston Purina," which has cut into Kellogg's market share over the past few years with its private-label cereals patterned after the top-selling brands. Most of those are Kellogg products: Corn Flakes, Sugar-Frosted Flakes and Rice Krispies.

Kellogg's portion of the $3.2 billion ready-to-eat cereal market has declined from about 41% in 1979 to about 38%. Ralston holds about 10% of the market, including 5.8% for its branded cereals (mostly through its Chex line) and 4.2% in private label.

A cereal "with crispy rice on one side and the sunny taste of corn on the other" seems unlikely ammunition for marketing wars. But in-

Clients continue shifting from 15%

Highlights of new ANA study

- 71% of advertisers use commission system, down from 75% in 1979, 83% in 1976.
- 29% of advertisers use fee system, up from 25% in 1979, 17% in 1976.
- 25% of advertisers made "significant" changes in compensation arrangements since 1979.
- 75% of advertisers audit agencies, up from 60% in 1979.
- 59% of advertisers conduct formal agency evaluations (including 81% of advertisers with budgets of $50 million or more).

GRENELEFE, FLA.—The traditional 15% commission system of agency compensation is continuing to lose ground, and advertisers are taking a greater interest in their agencies' finances, according to a new survey from the Assn. of National Advertisers.

"Extreme diversity in individual compensation arrangements is now the rule rather than the exception," said William M. Weilbacher, president of Bismark Corp., who conducted the survey for the ANA. It was presented here last week at ANA's financial management workshop.

Earlier in his speech he said, "There has been a gradual yet inexorable growth in fee arrangements over the years."

The findings are based on 263 questionnaires filled out by major national advertisers. Of the total, 71% used the traditional media compensation arrangement or a variation of it and 29% reported a fee setup.

"In addition, there has been a growth in the number of compensation arrangements which, although still nominally on the commission basis, use a commission percentage that is either greater or less than 15%," Mr. Weilbacher said. "Larger advertisers tend to pay less than 15%—sometimes much less than 15%—for the agency services they choose to receive. And smaller advertisers, or advertisers that choose to use a broad range of advertising agency services, often are willing to pay more than 15%, and sometimes much more than 15%, for the services they wish to receive."

It is the multitude of services now offered by agencies that has caused the compensation system to be modified.

Mr. Weilbacher said advertisers tend to pay more for those noncommissionable services, such as "production of rough and finished storyboards; new-product development work; casting; payment of union pension and welfare funds; processing of talent payments; negotiation of broadcast rights; development of shows for syndication, network use; travel expenses of agency production personnel; activities involved with the use of cable television; many research functions; creation and production of sales promotional and collateral materials; printing costs when supervised by the agency; etc. Not all advertisers pay extra for all of these services, but almost all advertisers do pay extra for at least some of them."

Paul Muller, manager-advertising controls, General Foods, said that with the growth of agency services there has been a corresponding increased involvement of advertisers in agency operations.

According to the survey, 59% of advertisers conduct formal agency evaluations, but 81% of the advertisers in the $50 million-plus advertising expenditure category hold such reviews, while 39% in the less-than-$5 million and 67% in the $10 million-to-$19 million-ad-budget categories conduct them.

The survey also found 75% of advertisers now audit agencies' books—up from the 60% that audited in 1979. "Almost 100% of the $50 million-plus advertisers audit, versus 85% for those spending $10 million to $19 million and 62% for smaller advertisers," Mr. Muller said.

"The survey indicates a strong trend toward increased advertiser interest in knowing how much the agency is making or losing on their business: 66% in 1982 against 56% in

Low profit may mean slow sale

Big media shun 'Sun-Times'

By ROBERT REED

CHICAGO—Virtually none of the nation's major newspaper chains will bid for Field Enterprises' Chicago Sun-Times—a development that dampens the company's hope for a speedy sale of its largest asset.

Knight-Ridder, New York Times Co., Gannett Co. and Capital Communications already have stated they will not explore a purchase. The Washington Post Co. would not comment on the Sun-Times, but highly placed insiders at the Chicago newspaper doubt that company is interested.

Otis Chandler, chairman of Times Mirror Co., which owns the Los Angeles Times, will talk with Sun-Times management this week, but admits his acquiring the daily "is not a very good possibility."

At this juncture it is unlikely Rupert Murdoch, the Australian newspaper magnate who has a history of snatching up troubled papers, will make a play, say analysts. He is renowned for purchasing at "fire sales" and the Sun-Times is still a profitable entity with an asking price in the $130 million range, they added. Mr. Murdoch was unavailable for comment.

It is also unlikely a smaller newspaper chain or a company outside the communications business will make an offer, says Ken Noble, industry analyst with Paine Webber, New York.

The lack of an aggressive suitor increases the probability a local syndicate, spearheaded by community and business leaders, will be the paper's most serious player, according to newspaper insiders and analysts.

James Hoge, Sun-Times' publisher, declined to comment on the paper's impending sale, referring instead to statements made at the initial announcement, which said Field Enterprises will seek a qualified buyer committed to publishing the paper.

The newspaper's sale comes as part of Field Enterprises' plan to dissolve its company, a move brought on by a long-running feud between the privately held concern's two stockholders, Marshall and Frederick Field (AA, April 18). Field has set a target date of a year to sell the paper; if the daily is unsold it will revert to a partnership owned equally by the Fields.

The pair, who are half-brothers, decided to liquidate the company because they each hold different interests and could not agree on Field's direction. Listed among its assets: The Sun-Times, four uhf television stations, a cluster of California cable operations and a one-third interest in KEYCOM Electronic Publishing. Annual revenues are $450 million, with the Sun-Times contributing nearly $250 million.

While industry executives consider the Sun-Times to be a quality newspaper, they contend it is doomed to

Reaction to Pepsi, BK drives diverge

By JOSEPH M. WINSKI

Pepsi-Cola and Burger King both launched important new advertising in March, but apparently with different results:

- Pepsi's introduction of its lavish "Pepsi Now" campaign was followed by only a slight, statistically insignificant, increase in consumer awareness of Pepsi advertising.
- Burger King's latest anti-McDonald's advertising helped BK ad awareness to climb substantially from February.

adWatch

Those conclusions are drawn from adWatch, a monthly survey of consumer awareness of advertising conducted by ADVERTISING AGE and SRI Research Center Inc., Lincoln, Neb. The survey consists of telephone interviews with a random sample of 1,250 consumers who are asked to name the advertising that first comes to mind of all seen or heard in the previous 30 days in 20 product categories. The March survey was conducted from March 1 through March 21.

Pepsi introduced its new advertising on March 7 (AA, March 7). Of consumers asked to name the soft-drink advertising that first came to mind last month, 20.3% named Pepsi, up 2.3 percentage points from 18% in February. A change of at least 2.7 points is required for statistical significance.

Pepsi again failed to dislodge Coca-Cola from the top spot in soft-drink ad awareness. Coke advertising was named by 23.2% of the respondents, an insignificant change from 22.4%

Pertschuk's plea: Turn FTC loose

WASHINGTON—Former Federal Trade Commission chairman Michael Pertschuk has seized an opening to test whether last fall's election has softened congressional hostility toward activist projects at the FTC.

In response to an invitation by Senate commerce committee chairman Robert Packwood (R., Ore.), Mr. Pertschuk, still serving as a Democratic FTC commissioner, dumped a package of stalled projects in the Senate committee's lap—including an investigation of beer, wine and liquor advertising—and invited the senators to order the FTC into action.

He reminded Sen. Packwood in a letter that "it was a similar invitation in 1969 by the Senate commerce committee which led eventually to the passage of much of the consumer legislation of the 1970s."

Mr. Pertschuk said Congress should:

- Direct the commission to conduct an industrywide investigation of alcoholic beverage advertising practices to determine "the extent to which they may be encouraging the consumption of alcohol by highly vulnerable groups, particularly young and heavy drinkers." The FTC, with Mr. Pertschuk dissenting, voted 3 to 1 last year to close a similar investigation first begun in 1976 with Anheuser-Busch and Somerset Importers as the initial targets.
- Direct the FTC to begin auto industry rule making that would set requirements for disclosing new car defects and standards of performance for new car warranties. Mr. Pertschuk said the Carter administration FTC ordered a handful of car makers to disclose defects and the Reagan FTC is considering settling a still pending 1980 defect case involving General Motors, but he complained that "no new auto defect cases have been brought during the present FTC."
- Direct the FTC to revive a Carter-era investigation of abusive nursing home business practices, which Timothy Muris, senior aide to FTC chairman James Miller, has in February. Pepsi and Coke have each led the category six times in the last 12 months, but Coke has led for the last four months.

Pepsi-Cola's new campaign, produced by BBDO, New York, has been the subject of close scrutiny in the hotly contested soft-drink industry. It replaced the "Pepsi's got your taste for life" campaign, considered by some to be one of Pepsi's more tepid efforts in recent years. Some industry observers have been surprised by what they believe to be the low visibility of the new campaign—especially when compared to the seemingly ubiquitous "Coke is it!" by McCann-Erickson, New York—but Pepsi officials say, "Pepsi now" has been the beneficiary of a heavy media schedule. Some of the new Pepsi commercials combine the long-running "Pepsi challenge" taste-test spots with vignettes from the "Pepsi now" commercials.

Coca-Cola Co.'s recently introduced Diet Coke was No. 3 in the category for the second straight month, with an awareness score of 8.5%, up from 7.8% in February. Philip Morris Inc.'s 7UP, which had been No. 3 until being overtaken by Diet Coke in February, was No. 4 again in March with a score of 4.6%, down from 6.9%.

Burger King's ad awareness, meanwhile, soared in March, apparently because of its new drive touting surveys that purportedly found consumers preferring "flame-broiled" hamburgers (Burger King-style) to fried burgers (McDonald's-style) "by nearly three-to-one." The effort began March 5 (AA, March 7).

Burger King ads were named as those first coming to mind by 21.4% of the respondents in the March survey, up from 10.8% in February. That was an increase of 10.6 points, the second-largest monthly gain of any advertiser covered by adWatch since the survey began in April, 1982. The only larger increase was the 15.7-point gain posted by Burger King last October when it launched its hard-hitting comparative campaign.

McDonald's continued to lead the category in ad awareness, however, with 41.4% of all responses, versus 43.6% in February. The insignificant 1.8-point decline stands in marked contrast to McDonald's 10-point plunge when Burger King made its surge last October. McDonald's new "McDonald's and you" campaign, which broke Jan. 15 and appears to be well received, may be a key reason that McDonald's awareness held last month.

Burger King's ad awareness fell sharply after it pulled back on its initial comparative advertising campaign, prepared by J. Walter Thompson USA, last fall. By February, its awareness trailed that of McDonald's by almost as much as it had before the controversial campaign began (AA, March 21).

It isn't known whether Burger King sales have increased as a result of its latest wave of comparative ads. An SRI Research Center analysis of last fall's Burger King ad awareness and sales increases showed a strong correlation between the two.

McDonald's and Burger King's combined 62.8% share of fast-food ad awareness in March is the most ever for the two burger chains. No other No. 1 and No. 2 advertisers in adWatch's 20 categories have dominated their group as McDonald's and Burger King did last month. (Pepsi and Coke's combined share of 43.5% was the next largest in March.)

Wendy's regained the No. 3 spot in fast-food advertising in March, after having lost it to Hardee's in February. Wendy's score of 3.7% was the same in both months, but Hardee's score fell to 2.6% in March from 4.2% in February.

In other developments last month:

- Tylenol continued its rebound in medicine & drug ad awareness following a slump after its advertising was halted in the wake of last September's tainted-Tylenol poisonings. Tylenol's ad awareness rose a significant 5.2 points in March to 38.6%, which was Tylenol's highest adWatch score yet, and more than doubled its 16.6% showing last October. Tylenol in March had an 8-to-1 margin over Anacin, No. 2 in the category with 4.7% of responses, down from 6.3%. Tylenol's lead over Anacin was the biggest margin held by the No. 1 advertiser in any category.
- Others showing significant ad awareness gains were Campbell's, No. 1 in canned foods with 14.2% of responses, up 3 points, and Tide, No. 1 in laundry products with a 4.2-point gain to 22.7%.
- The only advertiser posting a significant drop was Atari, whose No. 1 score in home electronics fell 3.5 points to 15%.#

company now would be able to match its international capability domestically. "Our goal in the U.S. is to be recognized as the 'reliable alternative' in an increasingly crowded field of courier companies," he said.

Sources said the primary system used by DHL to move packages to international points until now consisted of an ingenious concept. It used airline passengers as couriers. For example, the company would purchase a one-way ticket for a college student embarking on a holiday. The student's baggage, which could have contained any number of small DHL packages, was consolidated with regular baggage aboard the aircraft, and all the student was paying for was the excess luggage. DHL was paying for the one-way ticket but charging anywhere from $75 to $100 to a customer whose 3-lb. package was in the student's suitcase.

However, the airlines have caught up with this activity and have proposed legislation to the Civil Aeronautics Board to stop it.

John Beeby, DHL's marketing manager, said the 30-second spots will run in 16 major markets that make up about 50% of the actual and potential market of courier service users. Print ads and direct mail also will support.#

1979. Seventy-eight per cent of the largest advertisers review the profitability of their account with their agencies; 69% in the $10 million-to-$19 million [ad budget] class and 64% of the low-budget clients do so," he said.

Mr. Muller indicated that 25% of advertisers made significant changes in their compensation arrangements since the 1979 survey. These changes were made for three primary reasons: Changes in advertiser service requirements; the agency demonstrated that profit was inadequate, or the advertiser thought that agency profit was excessive.

The traditional commission system is still the dominant mode of compensation, but the slow trend to fee systems and variations of the commission setup continue. More than 80% of advertisers using the traditional commission system pay 17.65% on production costs. But among the largest advertisers within that group (more than $50 million), 40% pay 15%.

When asked how they compensate agencies for noncommissionable work, such as new-product development, 24% of the advertisers responding said they expected the agency to absorb development costs out of commissions earned on established products. The other 76% made additional payment, either reimbursing the agency for its out-of-pocket costs, paying all or part of salaries and overhead or allowing the agency a profit on the work.

For those on the fee system, the respondents said 55% of total fee arrangements reported were fixed fee; 28% were cost-plus, and 17% showed some variant of the two methods, Mr. Muller said. Examining the numbers, Mr. Muller added, "83% of fee advertisers responded affirmatively when asked whether they calculated the difference between what they paid the agency and what they would have paid under a commission arrangement. Two-thirds of them said that the fees were less than they would have paid under the commission system, and one-third said the fees were greater."

On cable, explored for the first time on the ANA questionnaire, 45% indicated they planned some cable usage in 1983. Of consumer package goods advertisers spending more than $50 million annually, 89% are planning to use some cable.

Mr. Muller reported that spending levels on cable tv are still "very low, but they appear to be related directly to the over-all size of the ad appropriation. Of those indicating planned cable use, 72 expect to spend less than $500,000 this year. Only 10 expect to spend at least $2 million this year."

John S. Bowen, president-chief executive officer of Benton & Bowles and the chairman of the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies, suggested that a greater flexibility in systems of agency compensation is particularly important now because of the technological revolution in the electronic media, the quicker client-agency response time as a result of computers, the growth of various communications services and international growth.

"Taken together, these four developing trends will inevitably put a greater demand on the client-agency relationship, if only because both parties will have to deal with this much broader array of alternatives," Mr. Bowen said.#

PBS ads won't supplant aid

WASHINGTON—Preliminary results from the congressional-sponsored test of conventional ads on public tv stations turn up only "minimal" hostile public reactions, but offer scant hope that ad revenues can be relied on to replace federal subsidies.

Three-fourths of the way through the yearlong test, the seven participating stations report no significant protests from their audiences. However, they project net ad revenues in amounts equal to only 5% to 15% of their operating budgets.

The seven stations had $2.9 million in ad revenues during the nine months, partially offset by direct selling expense equal to 25% to 30% of gross.

Bruce L. Christensen, president of National Assn. of Public Television Stations, said the figures indicate advertising can be a useful supplemental income device, but will in no way supplant federal support for public tv.

The verdict will depend on additional testing, which is to be completed by Oct. 1 when the Temporary Commission on Alternative Financing for Public Telecommunications is required to submit its final report to Congress. The report noted that several unfavorable aspects, including the effect on copyright and union contracts, as well as the tax obligations which would be incurred from "unrelated income" when nonprofit entities engaged in commercial activities, will have to be considered.

Of 60,000 letters and calls received by the stations during the nine months, only 1.5% concerned advertising and only half of these were negative. WTTW, Chicago, a leader in the test, reported that less than half of 1% of the 24,107 viewer comments it received during a three-month period related to advertising and only 40% of these represented objections to ads. WPBT, Miami, said it had only seven "negative" comments among 7,200 letters or calls since November. WYES, New Orleans, did not have a single adverse comment on commercials from callers during its recent fund-raising appeal. WHYY, which covers the Philadelphia area, had no formal tally, but said complaints were "negligible." WQED, Pittsburgh, received only two comments—one "for" and one "somewhat concerned."

The seven stations reported ad sales totaling $2,883,000. Some sold through representatives and some added their own sales staffs. Rates ranged from $1,440 for an especially desirable 30-second adjacency on WTTW, Chicago, down to as low as $20 for 30 seconds on WIPB, Muncie, Ind. Nearly all stations reported "significant rises" in national spot sales in recent months.

Public tv sales personnel found they had three strong selling points with advertisers, the commission's new progress report said: "Lack of commercial 'cluster,' a genial program environment and attractive program 'relationships'" (e.g., home repair companies are attracted by advertising purchases adjacent to home repair series, etc.).

WNEW, New York, and WQED, Pittsburgh, conducting a somewhat different test, increased their gross income by $588,750 with "enhanced" underwriting announcements, permitting contributors to elaborate on the supporter "credit" with 15 or 20-second institutional messages about the company.#

How commercials are doing on public tv

The mystery of the multiplying rabbet.

You don't have to be Sherlock to solve this one.

You just have to pick up a recent issue of MECHANIX ILLUSTRATED

Here a rabbet. There a rabbet. Everywhere you see a project involving building with wood, there will probably be a rabbet. Because, as any do-it-yourselfer knows, a rabbet is a special type of groove, on the edge of a board that helps to make a stronger joint between two pieces of wood.

We've got many more rabbets, because we've got many more projects in each issue of MI. That's what the do-it-yourselfer wants.

And, like the rabbet, the do-it-yourselfer is multiplying like crazy. And spending like crazy, too...Somewhere between 112 billion and 118 billion dollars by 1990, according to the Bureau of Building Marketing Research.

So, every month, we fill our pages with money-saving ideas, new product pages and fix-it news that will appeal to all those people who enjoy doing-it-themselves.

Put your advertising message in MECHANIX ILLUSTRATED and we're pretty sure your client's profits will be multiplying just as fast as our rabbets.

DDB to buy health shop

NEW YORK—After months of negotiations, Doyle Dane Bernbach International has agreed in principle to acquire Kallir, Philips, Ross (AA, Jan. 10). The addition of the $55 million health communications agency brings DDB's U.S. billings to $975 million.

DDB is buying the agency through an exchange of KPR capital stock for DDB common stock. Kallir, Philips, Ross will become a wholly owned subsidiary of DDB International. The 22-year-old KPR will continue to be run by John Kallir, president; Jerry Philips, director of client services; Warren Ross, chairman-executive committee, and Norman Cooper, exec vp-chief operating officer.

Neil Austrian, president-chief executive officer, DDB, said the agency bought Kallir, Philips, Ross because "they were the largest unaffiliated agency in the medical/pharmaceutical area, with an excellent reputation for creativity and long-term relationships with clients."

KPR's clients include Ciba-Geigy, McNeil Pharmaceutical, McNeil Consumer Products Co., Merck Sharp & Dohme, Ortho Pharmaceutical, Sandoz, Upjohn Co., Winthrop Labs, Wyeth Labs and USV Labs, among others.#

Brazil milk scandal sours Nestle image

By LAUREL WENTZ

SAO PAULO—It's not always easy to be Nestle.

When a milk contamination scandal erupted in Brazil recently—causing fresh milk sales to plummet and sparking a panic demand for powdered milk—milk producers, politicians and others hinted that multinational powdered milk producers such as Nestle must be behind it.

According to one Brazilian congressman: "The milk problem has come about exactly through the plotting of multinationals, captained by Nestle." Another legislator warned the Brazilian congress that multinationals are evolving "diabolical plans to dominate countries" such as Brazil.

Nestle responded with a quarter-page ad on the front page of Brazil's major Sunday newspapers. In the ad, the company denied involvement in any campaign to discredit the quality of fresh milk in Brazil in order to boost sales of powdered milk.

The controversy began when a prominent Sao Paulo pharmacist tested Brazilian milk and found it to be infested with bacteria. Sales fell by 35% last month in Sao Paulo state, according to the sales manager of Brazil's largest supermarket chain, Pao de Acucar. At the same time, powdered milk sales increased by 10% and would have soared had marketers not run out of Ninho, the market leader (a Nestle product), and many of the 23 other brands.

Sales of Leite longa vida (long-life milk), an ultrapasteurized milk with a six-month shelf life, jumped by 15%, the supermarket executive said.

Less reticent than Nestle, Leite longa vida appeared almost immediately in 60-second tv and radio spots, featuring an announcer explaining how long-life milk is processed and sold in safe, germless Tetra-pak containers.

Working through the weekend, Young & Rubicam produced the commercial in four days for client Tetra-pak, a Swedish company that specializes in liquid-food packaging.

"We felt it was the right moment to take advantage of the milk contamination notoriety to further explain to people long-life milk," said Y&R planning and accounts director Bob Kincey. "It's what you might call opportunistic."

In the milk scandal, no one is quite sure what Nestle is accused of doing. Some admen praised Nestle for its quick, decisive action in publishing a disclaimer, while others thought the company had overreacted in denying an accusation few people were aware of or likely to believe.#

BBDO out as Barclay, Camel change hands

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

An estimated $110 million in cigaret advertising crossed paths late last week, as McCann-Erickson resigned Brown & Williamson's controversial Barclay brand to take on Camel's worldwide business for R.J. Reynolds Tobacco. B&W immediately moved Barclay to a former RJR agency—Ogilvy & Mather. BBDO, the Camel agency, was left without.

Although it still has other RJR Industries business, BBDO is hell bent on getting another cigaret to replace the estimated $70 million Camel account. BBDO International chairman Bruce Crawford, no stranger to blockbuster client departures and arrivals—e.g., his agency's loss and subsequent reappointment to the $90 million-plus Dodge account—said the agency expects to be back in the cigaret business "in the near future."

Mindful that his agency still has RJR's Sea-Land Service and Del Monte (Hawaiian Punch juice and drink mixes), Mr. Crawford clearly was speaking through a muzzle when queried about RJR's explanation that Camel walked a mile to the McCann agency because of "an inability to establish a close relationship with BBDO."

All he would say was that the account team—largely staffed by creative people worldwide who "were doing a superb job on Camel advertising"—was being kept intact and easily could be assimilated within the agency if necessary.

RJR and competing cigaret companies openly acknowledged that BBDO's advertising concept—"Where a man belongs"—was an effective one. The concept evolved from the work of Team/BBDO, Germany, and eventually led to BBDO's getting the brand's worldwide advertising.

According to a source close to Reynolds, the success of the advertising may have played a role in the split. The source explained that BBDO developed an "attitude of aloofness, almost superiority" that apparently became too much for R. J. Reynolds Tobacco president Gerry Long, a tough-talking, nononsense native New Yorker.

The exec continued, "It was coming since last December. Mr. Crawford and especially Allen Ro-

Advertiser resistance, soft scatter sales cited

Net tv rates fall into line

By CRAIG REISS

New York—Ad agency network negotiators say the momentum in this year's upfront network tv season, which officially began last week, has swung to their side with network price hikes expected now to be about 10% to 12%, far below earlier predictions of rate increases of 15% to 22%.

Most mentioned by the agency network negotiators as a factor tipping the scales in their favor is the continued softness of the network tv scatter market. The scatter market, which includes network commercial time not sold during the previous upfront selling season, has been weak all year and continues to be soft as the networks begin selling third-quarter inventories.

Agency executives argue that the networks will be hard pressed to demonstrate the strong demand for their inventories during the upfront season, when the scatter market is indicating demand is not there.

Further, agency and advertiser sources indicate there is a growing resolve by advertisers to tie this season's network price increases to the rate of inflation, a position that the networks maintain is unreasonable.

The advertisers, however, argue that with the rate of inflation being close to zero, there is no way they could pass on the network rate increases to consumers without it being noticed and reflected in lost sales. They say that for the $100 million network tv advertiser, a 15%

Wood prepares for selling the 'new Sears'

By ROBERT REED

Chicago—A "new Sears" is emerging and with it sweeping changes in the company's all-important merchandising approach, designed to bury a dusty retail image.

On one level the new plan has already claimed some casualties. Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s merchandising group dismissed agencies J. Walter Thompson USA and Foote, Cone & Belding on April 29 and split its $130 million national advertising account between Ogilvy & Mather and NH&S/USA (AA, May 2). The agency shuffle comes in tandem with Sears' implementation of a dramatic systemwide store redesign and the No. 1 retailer's decision that a unified marketing front is needed to support this massive effort, says Robert Wood II,

Recovery year away, say ABP publishers

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

PHOENIX—Wait till next year.

That was the rallying cry of the 19th annual American Business Press spring meeting here last week.

A survey of the economic landscape—a less pleasant task than surveying the scenic wonders of Arizona—indicates that a full-fledged recovery for specialized business publications is unlikely before 1984.

Times continued to be tough, particularly for those publications covering fields hard hit by the recession. Some are even worried the results for 1983 will wind up below those of 1982. As if reflecting that concern, attendance here, at slightly more that 300, trailed last year's turnout by about 10%.

"My feeling is the industry in general will make a very gradual recovery, at best, during 1983," said Philip C. Lauinger Jr., president of PennWell Publishing Co., Tulsa. "We've seen the bottom and 1983 will be the leveling out and beginning of the new cycle. But it will be 1984 before we see any significant gains."

Dominic A. Mucchetti, president of Morgan-Grampian Publishing Co., New York, forecast that in "the last half, particularly the last quarter, we'll begin to see a turnaround and show a good 1984."

While Morgan T. Browne, president of New York-based Bill Communications, hopes "to see some improvement in the second half of this year, I think maybe [the upturn] will come as late as the middle of 1984. I think 1983 is going to be alright, but it's not going to be great. It certainly hasn't started off that way for us or for many others."

Mr. Browne wasn't alone in voicing these uncertainties. Discussions with other ABP members were peppered with words like "nervous" and "doubt." That was "partly because [the recession] has gone on so long," said Mr. Brown, "partly because of a broader problem—the economy is changing. I don't think many of us, if any of us, know how it's shifting. It's fear of the unknown, because none of

O'Toole calls them the 'OPEC of media'

FCB chief raps tv nets

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

NEW YORK—"We're paying more. We're getting less. And what we're getting is less effective," said Foote, Cone & Belding chairman John O'Toole in a sharp attack on tv's three major networks.

Speaking at the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies' Media Day here last week, the executive added that the prospect of higher tv rates is causing some advertisers to reevaluate plans for new products and media buys.

"The fact remains that we have clients reevaluating new-product introductions because the projected cost of network tv dilutes the payout too much," Mr. O'Toole said. "The fact remains that a good number of my clients and yours who have been traditional network advertisers will not be able to afford it soon."

He characterized the networks as the "OPEC of media" and added, "They do not wear burnooses, these suppliers, nor do they speak Arabic. They wear Giorgio Armani and speak double-talk."

"The crux of the problem is we are paying more, lots more," said Mr. O'Toole, who took part in a panel discussion titled, "Concerns About Media," with William Phillips, chairman-chief executive officer, Ogilvy & Mather, and William Ross, chief operating officer, Tatham-Laird & Kudner.

He said what is costing more is working less, citing research that indicated erosion of both audience and viewer recall. Recall went from 18% in 1965 to 7% in 1981. "The reason is obvious and its name is clutter," Mr. O'Toole said. "The most dramatic change that occurred during that period was the switch from one minute to 30 seconds as the standard commercial. That was in 1971-72. It may be the single worst decision in the history of network broadcast."

The second worst? "NBC's desperate and destructive offer to let advertisers split the 30 seconds into two separate spots," he added. "That's just what we need at a time when viewers are expressing and demonstrating their growing ennui, when poll after poll shows

ABC calls new lineup aggressive

By JAMES P. FORKAN

NEW YORK—ABC-TV, first to unveil its fall prime time programs, surprised many advertising executives here last week with some of its renewals and scheduling moves.

Tony Thomopoulos, ABC Entertainment president, who noted that his network won four nights of the week last season and is "closing in on CBS," characterized the fall schedule as "aggressive," especially on Thursday and Friday, its weakest nights. Although Monday and Saturday remain intact, he said ABC made "limited but significant changes" on Tuesday and Wednesday to maintain compatibility with the various lead-in shows.

The new comedies are "Just Our Luck," "Yes, But I'm Married," "Webster" and "It's Not Easy," while the four new dramas are "Hotel," "Trauma Center," "Lottery" and "Hardcastle & McCormick"—six hours' total.

Various agency experts like Ted Bates Advertising/New York senior vp Joel Segal and Paul Schulman of Gardner Advertising's Paul Schulman Co., had accurately assessed all or most of those entries as among ABC's strongest contenders. And most agencies had ex-

Change takes at Remy Martin

By GAY JERVEY

The sublimely fastidious process whereby cognac is distilled begins in a mammoth copper pot and has remained virtually unchanged since the 16th Century. Cellar masters use the same medieval still for the initial decocting; after that—as always—the cognac is aged in oak casks for a minimum of two to three years.

But while the process remains reverentially intact, change is very much in the air at Remy Martin Amerique's New York headquarters; so much so that many offices are only half-furnished and more than a few faces seem new and wide-eyed, not to mention slightly lost.

For in an unusual move for a French cognac producer, Remy Martin has taken over its own U.S. distribution from Glenmore Distilleries' Foreign Vintages subsidiary.

As president of Remy Martin Amerique and chairman of Premiere Wine Merchants, subsidiaries of the French parent E. Remy Martin & Co., 32-year-old Bob Beleson is a man in a hurry. He's in the position of having bitten off a lot to chew. Or drink, as the case may be.

In addition to the chicly ensconced flagship Remy Martin cognac, the joint venture company is marketing delights of the vine and grape that include Krug champagne, Grand Empereur brandy, A. de Luze & Fils Bordeaux wines, De Luze Classique and Dynasty wines.

All of this, Mr. Beleson, a self-proclaimed maverick, loves. If for no other reason than he can remember a time not too long ago—as recently as 1981, in fact—when there were just "two of us and two secretaries." Today, the operation employs 86 people, 52 of whom are in the headquarters here and the rest comprising the coast-to-coast sales team that was assembled in a short period of time to take over the task previously performed by Glenmore.

From 1979-1981, Mr. Beleson was vp-marketing of Remy Martin Amerique, during which time, sales of the product increased 45%, according to company figures. He left in 1981 to become a vp-management supervisor at Ogilvy & Mather, but was snared back by his alma mater last July.

"We're expanding right, left and center here, adding people, office space, even computers," said Mr. Beleson." The road to the wet paint and snowballing new products, however, has taken a few hundred years.

Although Remy Martin has been around since 1794—with exports to 160 countries, the brand reportedly comprises 14.7% of all cognac sold worldwide—it was not until the 1970s that the French company began to aggressively market its cognac in the U.S. In 1973, Remy Martin's U.S. sales totaled nearly seven million bottles; by 1981 that figure had nearly tripled to 19 million.

According to the April issue of Market Watch, published by M. Shanken Communications, Remy had depletions of 200,000 cases, up 11.1% over 1981. It called the market for cognac "one of the few

WHO BLENDED WARING INTO ICE CREAM?

It could be important to your marketing program. Because the same techniques that developed the Ice Cream Parlor for Waring, also put Baking Soda in more than thirty million refrigerators, developed Mellow Roast Coffee for General Foods, and Hi-C Drink Mix for Coca-Cola.

They could be just what you've been looking for to restage that fading star, or create a successful new product's plan. Gerald Schoenfeld, Inc., consultants to America's major marketers, now offers the "Better Concepts Program."

Question: While you're developing new products, who's watching the scores?

The answer to better concept scores—scores that exceed all bench marks—is better concepts.

Whether it's developing new products from scratch or treating old products like new, better concepts are the key.

bright spots in the American distilled spirits industry in recent years." It is dominated by four leading brands: Hennessy, Courvoisier, Martell and Remy Martin, which together comprise some 90% of the category's total sales.

But while Market Watch ranks Remy Martin fourth, it is gaining. "Over the last couple of years, I think Remy has done a terrific job of establishing unique brand awareness here," said Marvin Shanken.

To facilitate its U.S. onslaught, the French corporation in 1976 set up Remy Martin Amerique to oversee strategy and marketing. Until last month, though, the actual distribution was implemented by domestic marketers; first Renfield Importers and then Glenmore.

The Remy exec maintains that corporate intention all along has been to assume the distribution chores itself, although it was not until recently that the company could harness the necessary operational facilities and manpower. "It was part of our over-all worldwide strategic thrust to get involved in our own distribution, to go it on our own."

However, at the time of the parting, rumors surfaced that Glenmore's aftertaste was not the sweetest. Several industry sources suggest that Remy Martin may not have been completely clear about their intentions. Glenmore execs could not be reached for comment.

At any rate, the Glenmore/-Remy effort gave the brand a future, and Mr. Beleson has only praise for the landmark ads produced for Remy by Glenmore agency Mathieu, Gerfen & Bresner (now known as the Bloom Agency/New York).

"MG&B are young and hip and have a feel for fashion as well as spirits," Mr. Beleson noted. "And I think the signature campaign they did for us was really a breakthrough. It was great for awareness and recall. And because it was modern, sophisticated and fashionable, it really broadened our appeal."

Which was exactly what Remy had intended. Until the last decade, cognac was associated with studied and staid—if quasi geriatric—sophistication. "When you thought of cognac, you thought of gentlemen sitting around an armistice table and dividing up Europe," Mr. Beleson nodded. "We wanted to make it appeal to a younger, more urban and affluent audience. More women. You know, the Perrier crowd."

When Remy Martin struck out on its own, however, the agency resigned the business in order to stay with Glenmore. After a much publicized agency search, Mr. Beleson chose the relatively small agency of Margeotes/Fertitta & Weiss over such big-name finalists as N W Ayer; Wells, Rich, Greene; Ally & Gargano, and Peter Rogers Associates.

"I was flipping through a magazine one day and saw this ad for Godiva chocolates," Mr. Beleson recalled. "I thought, 'Hey, that's really neat stuff, I'd like to find the people who did it.'" They turned out to be Margeotes/Fertitta & Weiss, whose client roster includes Kirin beer, Buccellati fine silver and jewelry, Shiseido cosmetics and, of course, the attention-getting Godiva.

Although Mr. Beleson and his new agency are gleefully mysterious about the details of the impending Remy effort, scheduled to break in September, they are promising something new and different—and apparently quite sensuous.

"The new campaign will center on the cognac experience and will come at it from the sensory angle," hinted agency principal Dick Fertitta. "We want people to think about the moments they enjoy cognac; what they were doing, thinking and feeling. And the effort will be very specific to Remy."

Other Remy Martin products are handled by Geer, DuBois, which began its Remy/Premiere association with the importer's newer brandy, Grand Empereur, a premium French brandy that debuted in selected markets last fall.

It currently can be found in San Francisco, Chicago and the New York metropolitan area. "Grand Napoleon is really after the strivers, those 25-to-40-year-olds who are looking for the best they can buy," said Richard Seclow, president of Geers, DuBois. "As opposed to Remy, which I suspect has several audiences—both those older people who have arrived and the younger one who are still trying to get there."

Mr. Seclow and crew also are hard at work on Premiere's test marketing of De Luze Classique wines, which began last November and currently has expanded to Baltimore/Washington, Dallas, Rochester, Buffalo and Providence.

At just shy of $5, De Luze fits into the popularly priced, but not necessarily cheap, price range that is considered a key growth area. According to Mr. Beleson, De Luze was developed precisely with the American market in mind. "We're giving them the real Bordeaux thing—the right kind of bottle, package, the works."

The product sports clear and memorable nomenclature, enhanced with the label's Seurat pointillist painting, a wistful picnic scene on the Seine.

Premiere clearly hopes to differentiate De Luze in the mind's eye—to separate it from the many wine bottles cluttered with abstruse, tongue-twisting names.

Among its other projects, Premiere is preparing a new marketing push for Krug, the very champagne served at the Royal Wedding, as Mr. Beleson likes to say. Although a state-of-the art champagne abroad, Krug is still a well-kept secret here, despite some earlier attempts to make it otherwise.

According to Mr. Beleson, Premiere's blueprint for growth calls for many new products, with at least two more "mass-oriented ones" in the works. Maybe "mass," but not likely plebian.

As Market Watch points out, the cognac boom giving rise to Remy/Premiere's current growth reflects consumer interest in status, superpremium products. And there Remy/Premiere will likely chart its current, very au courant course: Marketing chi-chi, palatable products.#

Bates hands creativity task to Zuckert

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

New York—When exec vp Donald Zuckert decided to take the presidency of Ted Bates Advertising/New York, he handed his boss, Robert Jacoby, a wooden box from Abercrombie & Fitch that contained two bitten bullets. After a weekend of soul-searching, Mr. Zuckert figuratively had acted out the metaphor.

The 23-year Bates veteran last week moved up at an agency known for its account strengths and its Unique Selling Proposition concept. It is also an agency that is acting on a vision: To be considered a top creative shop.

"If you asked someone to name the top three creative agencies, we probably would not be named," said Mr. Jacoby, chairman, president-chief executive officer of Ted Bates Worldwide. "We want to be named."

To that end, Mr. Jacoby last year lured Michael Becker away from Young & Rubicam and installed him as the worldwide creative leader. Two weeks ago, Mr. Becker brought in the creative team of Nancy Vaughn and Tom Heck from Wells, Rich, Greene (AA, May 2). At the same time, several staff members were let go as Bates attempted to upgrade its creative department. According to Mr. Jacoby, the plan is to replace and add more. "We are not going to slow down in terms of creative versatility," he said, adding that only last week, Bates started a new production unit, under Rick Wysocki, formerly of Benton & Bowles.

"Strategically, we continued to be on target, but executionally, for a lot of the clients, there has been some slippage in the creative product," Mr. Zuckert said. "So we've made that a top priority."

D. Zuckert

The new Bates/New York president agrees with this creative goal. The last person to hold the post, Robert Bruns, didn't. Mr. Bruns lasted 18 months in the job. "He did a good job," Mr. Jacoby said. "I don't know why he left. I was sorry to see him go. But he didn't think it was necessary to expand our creative capability. We did have our debates on it, but it wasn't anything to leave for." According to others, Mr. Bruns has not taken another job but is hard at work perfecting his tennis game.

Mr. Bruns had trouble working with Mr. Jacoby, and Mr. Jacoby had trouble turning over the reins to Mr. Bruns. "When Bruns was here, I turned to international and did more traveling," Mr. Jacoby said. "It was very difficult for me to give up that job [of president]. When I decided to put Bruns in, I had to do an awful lot of soul-searching. I grew up in advertising. I had to back away. And Bruns had an operating style that cut me off very fast. He slammed the gate on me, so all of a sudden I went from getting 2 ft. of mail every day to a stack measuring a quarter-inch. My motor was running, but I didn't have any place to run it. Donald [Zuckert] is not that way. I don't second-guess a guy. If he screws up after a year, I fire him, but I don't second-guess him."

When Mr. Jacoby offered the job to Mr. Zuckert in mid-April, it wasn't for the first time. Three years ago, when Mr. Jacoby decided it was time to turn over the presidency to someone else, he offered the job to Mr. Zuckert. As U.S. affiliates' group president, Mr. Zuckert negotiated the purchase of such Bates' subsidiaries as McDonald & Little and William Esty Co. That expansion effort had top pri-

AA's Cohen elected to hall of fame

Washington—Stanley E. Cohen, Washington editor and editorial page editor of Advertising Age, has been elected to the Washington Journalism Hall of Fame by the Washington chapter of the Society of Professional Journalists.

The hall of fame honors "men and women who have earned the highest esteem and affection of their colleagues in the news media in the nation's capital as a result of their exemplary professional achievements, outstanding service to other members of the profession and lifelong dedication to the highest standards of journalism," SPJ said.

S. Cohen

Hall of fame members have 25 years or more service as journalists in Washington.

Other Washington journalists being inducted into the hall of fame with Mr. Cohen at ceremonies here June 17 are Henry Brandon, diplomatic correspondent for the Times of London; George Herman of CBS News; Neil MacNeil of Time, and Sarah McClendon of McClendon News Service.

Mr. Cohen began his Washington career with Broadcasting in 1942. A year later he succeeded the late John Crichton—subsequently editor of Ad Age and later president of the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies—as Washington editor of AA. He achieved recognition as a commentator on business/government relations, with particular emphasis on consumerism and its impact on the regulatory process. In 1979, Mr. Cohen received the Consumer Federation of America's National Consumer Media Award.

Mr. Cohen is a vp of Crain Communications, which publishes Ad Age, and is head of its 11-person Washington news bureau serving all Crain publications.#

'New consumer' puts new rules in the vegetable till

By Mary McCabe English

As a kid who couldn't remember a time without frozen food, I always found my grandfather's admonitions—"canned is best" and "you can't trust that frozen stuff"—kind of mysterious. Grandpa would certainly find today's supermarkets, including the old American Store in his hometown of Conshohocken, Pa., kind of mysterious, too.

Simply put, back in his day, buying a can of peas was, well, buying a can of peas. He would no doubt snort in good-natured disbelief at being forced to decide the relative merits of generic vs. name brand, salted vs. salt-free or sugared vs. light or, worse still, "lite," and all "that frozen stuff" packaged in single serve and boil-in-a-bag for sake of convenience.

If we took grandpa to the supermarket today, he indeed would be amazed and confused. And, probably, he would be most baffled by the endless aisles carrying fresh, frozen and canned vegetables. It is those rows that represent in the extreme the trends manipulating grocery marketers in virtually any product sector; they also harbor goods that would most likely clash with the choices grandpa made.

Those vegetables—always limp and canned—that grandpa placed with other goods in the old brown leather carry-all bag he used to cart his purchases home were a sort of necessary evil in his day, or so I thought.

Since then the quest for bigger, juicier, buttery, less salty, lighter and more fresh, frozen and exotic vegetables has captured food marketers. And none of the inevitable changes has occurred in a vacuum, but they have been the result of evolving needs and life styles of the shoppers who buy them.

The word "household," for instance, has been inflated by living arrangements that simply did not exist to the same degree 20 years ago—singles, with and without children; young and middle-age working couples, again with and without children; retired couples, and, as the ranks of these types swell, a diminishing pool of "traditional" families with stay-at-home moms and working dads.

The demographics are indeed fragmented. But consider the following factors: The steady growth in the number of working women, the popularity of small families, the country's ongoing preoccupation with nutrition and fitness and the sophistication that mobility and media have wrought on our collective taste buds. They have made convenience, nutrition, variety and value-consciousness, rather than price-consciousness, the psychographic needs that manage to straddle demographic segmentation.

The low salt-no salt and "light" movements, influenced more by want (the health kick) than need (for acute health problems), has resulted in products with broad-based salt and/or sugar-reduced variations, either new or repositioned.

These sugar-reduced food and beverages are "probably the most successful new products in the past five years," says Martin Friedman, editor of Dancer Fitzgerald Sample's "New Product News" newsletter.

The one thing that will color the prognosis for this category, he says, will be the impact of aspartame, the natural low-calorie sweetener 200 times sweeter than sugar that is causing food marketers to beat a path to the door of founder, G.D. Searle & Co., Skokie, Ill. (See story on Page M-14.) Positioning of new products in the "light" sector has caused a certain degree of confusion. Marketers have settled for the health maintenance-sell as a sort of broad catch basin to attract consumers who want such products and those who need them. Stouffer's has done this with its well-received, single-serve line of Lean Cuisine, which was rolled out nationally last year. The year also saw Weight Watchers repositioning and partially reintroducing a line of frozen entrees and the first growth for frozen, single-serve entrees in approximately two years, according to Selling Areas-Marketing Inc. (SAMI).

But while the "whole weight area will continue to be big," says Mr. Friedman, the outlook for salt-free and reduced-salt products, specifically, is somewhat iffier.

"These kinds of segments usually peak out at somewhere around a 20% share of the overall category they're in, and the thing that determines whether or not they get to that 20% is their taste parity with the real thing," explains Thomas R. Batey, executive vp with Glendinning Associates in Westport, Conn., a consulting company. He believes marketers are taking great risks in appealing to consumers with "light" products. In soups, for example, consumers attracted to low-salt for whatever reason may give up prepared soups altogether because they don't want the traditional brands with salt, and the ones low in salt may not be palatable to them.

INTRODUCING
LIBBY'S NATURAL PACK
Libby's
Libby's
Libby's
NEW NATURAL PACK

Libby takes the no-salt, no-sugar approach.

"A major key to how far these reduced-salt products go will be the development of a good, palatable salt substitute, because there are very few substances today that can be substituted for salt that actually taste like salt," he says.

Others believe the reduced salt trend may find its ultimate form in the middle of the road. Mr. Friedman points to a line of 50% salt-reduced tomato products introduced late last year by S&W Fine Foods, San Mateo, Cal., as an example.

The reduced salt movement has touched everything from cereals to tuna fish to medications, but the canned vegetables category has been one of its biggest catches.

Del Monte Corp., San Francisco, which dominates the category nationally, this year added stewed tomatoes and three sizes of catsup to bring its new line of no-salt vegetables introduced last August to 18 items. S.S. Pierce Co. at the same time has been converting almost all of its Libby vegetables—12 items in 33 sizes and varieties—to a new Natural Pack line that includes no salt, no sugar or other additives. Hunt-Wesson Foods has brought forth Hunt's no-salt-added line of canned and bottled tomato products.

Regional canners such as Comstock Foods in Newark, N.Y., a division of Agway Inc.'s Curtice-Burns subsidiary, and a number of private label packers also are looking to capitalize on consumers' disenchantment with sodium.

Not that any of the canners have any illusions about luring droves of fresh and frozen vegetables aficionados into their camp, their target is already a canned vegetable user: "We don't think we'll get people who prefer fresh and frozen to switch to canned, but we do think there are a lot of people out there who already use cans who would welcome the availability of products with less salt than they've been getting," says a spokesman for S.S. Pierce.

S&W Fine Foods, which has been in the dietetic section since 1924, believes its 50% salt reduction is the soundest way to go after those consumers and hold their interest over the long-term.

SW Spring
SW Lite
SW Lite
SW Lite
SW Lite

S&W is committed to 50% salt reduction.

"A lot of consumers think no-salt is a great idea until they taste it, and then you're left with a great idea that nobody wants to buy," says Richard N. Fink, S&W's vp-marketing.

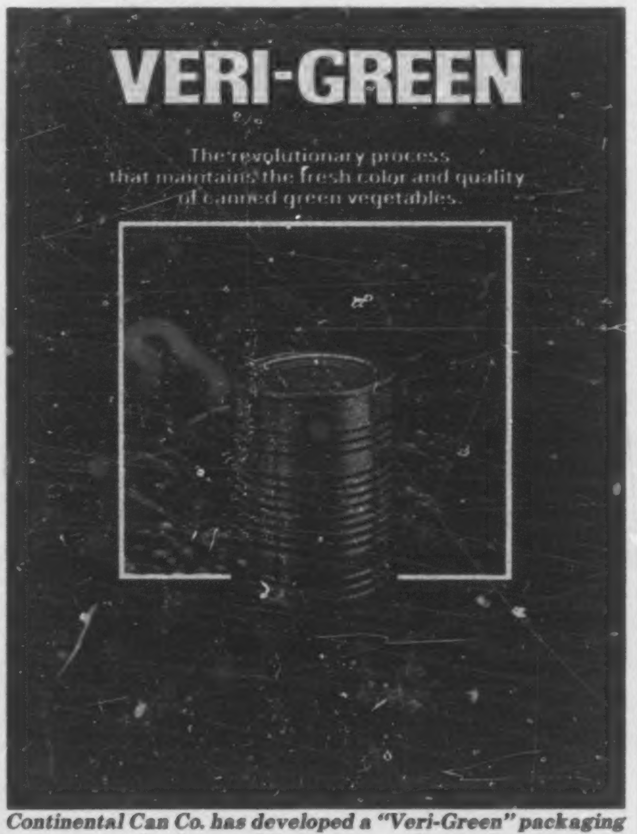
Pierce's spokesman, understandably, believes the all-or-nothing approach is the best way to contemporary consumers' salt-conscious hearts. "There's going to be a palate adjustment, and the easy way is to take out half the salt, but that's not the market," he says, conceding that repeat trial is the key in winning over the consumer to reduced-salt products.

The Pierce spokesman acknowledges that one stumbling block is the mistaken perception that salt is necessary as a preservative.

While salt does tend to even out the borderline taste qualities of over or under-mature vegetables, "Natural Pack puts greater responsibility on us to provide better quality . . . something that we have taken steps to do," he says.

Del Monte officials say the success of their no-salt vegetables has exceeded expectations and will result in the expansion of the line, but they decline to elaborate.

To counter consumer hesitancy in retrying a no-salt product because of taste, the company is boosting consumer awareness of the no-salt line in a magazine campaign in general interest books such as People and Southern Living. Del Monte also has been running ads in nine major markets for its regular vegetables, something that "hadn't been done for years, the idea being that Del Monte now gives you a choice," says a spokesman.



VERI-GREEN
The revolutionary process that maintains the fresh color and quality of canned green vegetables.

Continental Can Co. has developed a "Veri-Green" packaging system to take the usual limpness out of canned vegetables.

Branded vs. generic

Consumers have yet another choice to make: A choice among generics, national brands and private labels.

Many observers agree that the hoopla and hype over generics have far surpassed their inroads in the marketplace. And the consensus seems to be that generics have reached a plateau. In fact, SAMI data indicate that although generics' market share of SAMI-monitored categories is slightly over 2%, they actually account for less than 1% of total supermarket sales.

Mr. Batey of Glendinning Associates believes, in fact, that as the economy improves and there is less price-consciousness, "generics will go down, and the trade will be more aggressive with their private labels. Generics are really just another tier in price offerings. What they do is force another bottom tier. In hard times a person's desire and willingness to trade down is largely related to his need to do so. And as people get more discretionary money to spend, their tendency is to trade up."

Generics have been particularly strong in the canned vegetable category, but even here their share hovers around 4% to 5%, with national brand and private label garnering slightly less than two-thirds and one-third of total share, respectively, according to SAMI. Among plain frozen vegetables, generics' share goes even lower—to approximately 1% to 2%—and the national brand-private label balance shifts, with private label claiming roughly two-thirds of the market and the national brand, about one-third.

However, the national brand has almost the entire market on frozen prepared or recipe vegetables, leaving only about one-tenth of the market to private label.

From a marketing standpoint, Mr. Batey says, premium products give the brand people a competitive edge that helps counter private label's general strength in the frozen cases, especially at a time when consumers are so hot on both gourmet touches and variety.

"With a gourmet product, a manufacturer can demand premium prices and good profit margins," Mr. Batey notes. "At the other extreme, with the plain commodity products, it's hard for a manufacturer to make money because of the intense competition. So, for profit reasons, gourmet is always going to be attractive."

Growth in gourmet

"New Product News" editor Mr. Friedman describes gourmet food, in general, as "a booming area," one that will continue to grow given the mobility of the American public and the number of gourmet and food-related magazines on the market.

Others suggest that the yen for more exotic food fare may stem partially from an economy that places out of reach many more expensive "self-indulgences." Denied such luxuries, consumers respond by trading up in the things they can afford, says Neill J. Kelly, marketing manager with General Foods' Birds Eye agricultural division, who cites as an example the marked growth in consumer's taste for "complex vegetables" such as broccoli, cauliflower and spinach. "Peas, corn, beans . . . they're not growing nearly as much."

He says that in addition to the development of a more sophisticated palate, Americans desire more variety, which is reflected in one of the fastest growth segments at Birds Eye—the vegetable combinations introduced over a year ago under the Birds Eye Farm Fresh Mixtures label.

Although the frozen vegetable market has not been at its best in the last few years, Mr. Kelly believes that contemporary consumer profiles spell growth years ahead: The market will grow through the 1980s and do so faster than the grocery industry as a whole because, psychographically, people want vegetables—and from an attitudinal standpoint, vegetables will stay strong—and, demographically, frozen is in an excellent position to meet that need because it gives the consumer high quality as well as convenience."

Fresh turns trendy

In the meantime, the move to fresh is one of the biggest developments on the vegetable front, leading to the emergence regionally of a broad range of branded vegetables. (See story on Page M-40).

New retail concepts, such as salad bars, have entered the supermarkets. "This is the result of consumer demand for good-for-you food," says Supermarket Business editor Ken Partch.

Companies such as Health Valley Natural Foods (in Montebello, Cal.) are cashing in on the health/fresh market by offering supermarkets entire lines of foods, ranging from soups to entrees.

Health is synonymous with fresh produce in this market. That a daily programing spot produced by Mighty Minute Programs in San Francisco on fresh produce—Joe Carcione's "The Green Grocer"—has been picked up by 60 tv stations across the country, is one gauge of the spreading mania for unprocessed vegetables. (Contracts for the spot are coming in at the rate of two or three a week.)

Government flow charts are another indication. Michael Stellmacher, an agricultural economist with the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Economic Research Service, says fresh vegetable consumption has outstripped both canned and frozen.

"Right after World War II, there was an increase in the consumption of processed vegetables and a decrease in fresh," Mr. Stellmacher notes. He says the trend held until the early 1970s when consumption of fresh took off and canned dropped. Frozen vegetables have headed generally on in an upward trend, but total consumption is still small compared with canned and fresh.

Packaging convenience

Convenience will more than likely be the influential factor in packaging design in the future, if it is not already. Bill Sander, general manager of frozen foods at Pepperidge Farm, which recently launched Vegetables in Pastry, says boil-in-a-bag and microwave-compatible packaging will quickly evolve into other forms of packaging, with the need for convenience underlining the new designs.

Kraft Inc., for one, is perfecting technology for retort packaging—laminated aluminum and plastic that give a "perishable" product shelf stability—in a current test of nine varieties of A la Carte entrees carried in the retort packets.

Continental Can Co., Stamford, Conn., says packaging innovations planned or in test will improve the quality and appearance of canned vegetables. The company has developed a Veri-Green system to counteract the effect of heat during retorting, the result being "fresh, green vegetables from a can."

Typical of the coming innovations in food processing methods is Ultra-Natural, a new approach to open flame sterilization that yields canned fruits and vegetables with a color, taste and texture close to fresh-cooked produce. "This will bring about dramatic reductions in shipping weight," says a Continental Can spokesman.

Mr. Batey at Glendinning is convinced food breakthroughs will be found in new processing and distribution techniques. "If vegetables could be preserved without freezing and maintain the same taste and texture as frozen vegetables, that would be a real breakthrough because of the extremely expensive distribution requirements of frozen.

"Who knows where such technology will come from? Maybe from space or medical technology. But it's something we might well see one day."

A consumer dossier

One of the most recent attempts to provide intelligence on today's supermarket consumer is the "Supermarket Shoppers' Profile," published by the Food Marketing Institute (FMI), Washington.

For one thing, reports the grocery industry's trade organization, males are assuming roles or joint responsibility for approximately 40% of supermarket shopping trips.

Among the differences observed between male and female shoppers were that men spent less time and money per trip and per week, reported more brand loyalty, planned less, used supermarket information such as unit pricing, product freshness dates and newspaper advertising and placed less emphasis on economy.

They also agreed more that "grocery shopping takes too much time" and less that "grocery shopping is an important task for me to perform."

The study also details several differences between the shopping habits of working and nonworking women. For example, the "stay-at-home" group planned more, used supermarket information more and economized more. In addition, this group felt more than other women that grocery shopping was an important task, spent less money per week and per family member on groceries and shopped in a greater number of supermarkets.

With respect to marital status, single shoppers viewed grocery shopping as less important than did married shoppers. And they did not focus on economy or planning as much, and they claimed less usage of nutritional labeling and paid less attention to product freshness dates.

In terms of age, consumers 65 and over viewed grocery shopping as more enjoyable and important than any other age group. This group also reported the greatest amount of planning, usage of supermarket information and emphasis on economy.

On the other hand, 40- to 49-year-olds spent nearly twice as much per week and "considerably" more per person on groceries than most other age groups.

The 18- to 24-year-old group prepared shopping lists, used information and shopped for specials less than any other age group. This group was also found to view grocery shopping as less important than any other age group.

Not surprisingly, FMI also found that income level and geography further affected shopping behavior and attitudes. Higher income shoppers, as an example, generally do less budgeting, redeem fewer coupons, shop less frequently for specials and check prices less than lower income groups. As for geography, urban grocery consumers do more planning and economizing and spend less time and money than suburban shoppers.

Dr Pepper looks to European expansion

By HOWARD SHARMAN

LONDON—It has been a year since Dr Pepper was launched in the U.K., but one probably would be forgiven for not having noticed.

The low-key launch, backed by local radio, left Dr Pepper's share at less than 1%, although Stanley Mace, the company's manager of international operations, said, "We hit our forecast last year."

Now Dr Pepper is ready to boost its presence in its initial markets, the U.K. and the Netherlands, and is preparing to expand throughout Europe.

In the U.K., where it is tied to bottler Britvic (part of the giant Allied-Lyons Co.), a new advertising agency, J. Walter Thompson Co. subsidiary Lansdowne/Euro, is putting together a tv campaign for London that will break this summer. The amount spent will be modest, however, compared with the millions of dollars spent by rivals Coca-Cola Co. and PepsiCo.

Last year's creative approach, by Freeman Mathews Treasure agency, was based on "the hard soft drink" and has been scrapped. Dr Pepper also has reevaluated the target market in the U.K. and moved from 16-to-24-year-olds to 11-to-17-year-olds. Research showed that it was the younger group that was trying Dr Pepper.

"We are testing the level of marketing support that is needed," Mr. Mace said, "and we will transfer to a national basis next year if it works." He insisted that Dr Pepper has entered the market for the long term. "We want to be a major contender in the market, and the company does have the money to invest, but not in a splashy way. We have to build up trial and consumer awareness."

In the Netherlands, the picture is very similar. A market share of slightly more than 1% has been achieved and the marketing effort this year will be increased significantly, including cinema, radio and sports and youth-oriented sponsorships. Sampling has worked particularly well in the Netherlands, according to Mr. Mace. "We have concentrated on sampling a lot, and in the outlets where we have sampled heavily we are doing well."

With launches in these two countries well under way, Dr Pepper is looking for more European expansion. Next year, there will be a limited test market in Italy and a launch in Scandinavia. Switzerland and Portugal are also possibilities.

Dr Pepper has initial problems with its taste. "Both in the U.K. and in the Netherlands there is resistance to the taste, but it seems lower here than in new markets in the U.S.," Mr. Mace said. "Europeans may be more experimental; it may be because cola is less dominant here."

In both the Netherlands and the U.K., he is looking for "trial and retrial. We have to get people to keep on trying the product. We have found that the more you drink it, the more loyal you get."

Alan Moss, marketing manager of Britvic, said, "The trade is aware of the drink's success in the U.S. and knows that the unique taste needed a unique approach, and that in 1982 we would not necessarily go in with all guns blazing."

He said Dr Pepper is "a brand with full-brand qualities, not a me-too product," and this has helped when talking to the trade and has meant that sometimes a premium fee can be charged for Dr Pepper because it is different from the colas. On shelf space, which has become crowded with the Diet Coke launch, Mr. Moss said: "We are not finding it a problem to get shelf space, but we are not looking for massive displays of Dr Pepper—we don't want to engender enormous displays at this stage of the product's life. We only want our share of facings."

Mr. Mace said the quiet debut was exactly what was planned. "We take a slow-burn approach," he said. "We aim to get good distribution, build up a base and then step up the marketing effort each year."#

Despite decaffeinated segment's growth

Coffee sales dip continues

By JOHN C. MAXWELL JR.

As has been the case in every year since 1962, coffee consumption dropped in 1982. While demography indicates that as the population ages, coffee consumption increases, we find that life style has overridden demographic data.

People continue to prefer cold and sweet drinks to hot, most probably because of the "speed" aspect of our environment—they don't want to wait for something to cool off. We see no immediate signs of a turn in coffee consumption, although the rate of decrease is certainly abating. Retail prices topped out in 1980.

The trend toward soluble coffee continues, along with the shift toward decaffeinated products. These trends were pointed out in a recent study by the International Coffee Organization, noting that in 1962 one out of every 25 people drank decaffeinated coffee, while last year it was one out of every seven. (Soluble coffee accounts for two-thirds of the consumption of decaffeinated coffee.)

According to the ICO study, use of this product increases with age. It is obvious that the soft-drink industry has caught on to this trend, and every major soft-drink producer has or shortly will offer products that have no caffeine. Currently this is the fast-growing area of that market.

As far as companies are concerned, General Foods just about maintained its market share in 1982, with regular up slightly and instant down. Procter & Gamble is doing extremely well in instant, but only fair with regular.

In brand shares, GF's Master Blend appears to have had the best jump in regular, while Nestle's Taster's Choice Decaffeinated showed one of the best jumps in the instant area.

- The industry is again moving on a campaign to reverse coffee consumption's decline, with a $24 million budget. Part of the money will be contributed by some coffee producing countries. For a change, the program is being aimed at the younger generation, as the industry tries to make coffee a more "in" product.#

Britain poised for political ads

working" poster work in 1979 is credited with helping the Conservatives gain power, has been reappointed by the Conservative Party; Gold Greenlees Trott, one of the brightest of the new agencies, has been selected by the SDP, and Wright & Partners has been appointed by the Labour Party.

Wright & Partners, formed in a breakaway from Grey Advertising in December, 1981, is the first full-service agency to be enlisted by the party. In the past, an ad hoc committee of admen who support Labour has handled advertising.

"In many ways, they are the most civilized and reasonable people I have worked with as clients," says Wright & Partners managing director, Johnny Wright. "They'll listen to what we say, and the campaign is our campaign, not one designed by a committee."

The amount of money spent by the political parties still is minuscule by U.S. standards, and small even by U.K. product-advertising standards. But the work itself is considered a publicity plum, especially following the reaction to the famous Saatchi posters of 1979.

Ad spending plans are a closely guarded secret. But for the last election the Conservative Party spent $2.7 million, according to its director of marketing, Chris Lawson, and he says spending this time around will run at the same level "in real terms." This implies a budget of $3.1 million to $3.9 million.

The campaign budgets for SDP—which is allied with another party, the Liberals—and the Labour Party are not likely to reach more than $1.2 million each, so they will be heavily outspent by the Conservatives, as they were during the last elections.

British electoral rules control closely the amount of money each candidate can spend on promoting himself in his constituency, but there is no restriction on over-all party advertising.

Mr. Lawson agrees that the Conservative campaign this time around will be very different from the Saatchi ads that helped them into power, stating, "In opposition you are always knocking the government, and we are highly unlikely to produce a similar campaign to last time."

- The poster campaign for the SDP, made up largely of moderate renegades from the Labour Party, aimed to publicize the five-minute broadcast the SDP and Liberals put out on commercial and noncommercial tv last month. Again, the rules say that political advertising, as such, is not allowed on tv, but the parties are allocated five or 10-minute "party political broadcasts" according to the ratio of their votes at the last election.

The posters, with their dramatic graphic illustration of the extreme views of the Conservative and Labour Parties, went up originally without the SDP logo on them—a decision that upset some party members. "Initially, we wanted to take the chance of not putting our name on the posters," says Roger Carroll, the SDP's director of communications.

"We wanted to create dissatisfaction with the existing choices and then put over something more positive," he continues. "There is a strong chance of a June election, so we wanted to be in the field. But we also have to keep things back for a campaign next year, if necessary."

The SDP posters now have been pasted over with the SDP logo—a move the cynics and political opportunists are saying was not planned, but a reaction to the public's incomprehension over whom the posters were for.

There is grave suspicion among politicians here of advertising's role in politics; accusations of selling political parties like soap powder flew around during the last election. These people seem, publicly at least, still to see advertising as the "hidden persuader" that takes away people's ability to make a decision on their own. But the professional marketing men within the political parties see advertising as a necessary—if limited—part of their communications arsenal.

"Advertising can't make something popular that is unpopular," says the SDP's Mr. Carroll, "but it can help highlight the appealing aspects of the party. Advertising is a marginal influence, but you have to add together all the marginal influences to make a substantial change in people's views."

Mr. Carroll stresses the fact that it is the politicians who are still the main means of communicating with the electorate, and says that the major difference between the U.K. and the U.S. is the existence of the national media and the public service slant of all broadcasting, which means that serious topics are given discussion time on the air.

"Advertising is an important link in the chain," says the Conservatives' Mr. Lawson, "and it has become more important because of the decline of public meetings."

- For Mr. Wright, the question is not so much the role of advertising in politics as the role of politics and political advertising in his ad agency. The Labour Party this time around will be presenting a radical manifesto to the public, one that will include commitments to pull out of the European Economic Community, to nationalize or renationalize large parts of industry and to get rid of the U.K.'s nuclear weapons. It is not a manifesto that will appeal to a majority of the business community.

"We had one new-business prospect who said he would not continue discussions with us because of our working with the Labour Party, but it has never been raised as an issue by our [existing] clients. I am a member of the Labour Party, but this is not a Labour agency. It is a commercial relationship," says Mr. Wright.#

Nielsen: New video alters viewing habits

NORTHBROOK, ILL.—A.C. Nielsen Co.'s 1983 report on tv, based on 1982 statistics, says new video alternatives are changing viewing habits.

Among the highlights: Most tv viewing occurs between 8 p.m. and 10 p.m. (ET) and during the winter, in large pay cable households and in households with children and teen agers (AA, May 2). Viewing on the average has peaked at six hours and 48 minutes daily, the highest ever. Sixty-seven per cent of U.S. tv households can receive nine or more channels of programing, including cable.

Households with nine or 10 available channels, on the average, view about 55% of them. Households with 20 or more channels available view 35% of them at least 10 minutes a week.

However, households subscribing to pay cable services generally view more than noncable or basic cable service households. Although 62% of viewing in pay cable households during prime time still was of network offerings, viewing of cable programing increased 42% last year over 1981.

Nielsen's Home Video Index Study in July indicated videocassette recorder ownership is the greatest in large urban counties, in the West and among pay cable households. Las Vegas ranked first in vcr ownership among U.S. cities, with 15.4% of tv households, followed by Anchorage with 13.8% and Chicago with 8%.

- Nielsen estimates that 83.3 million U.S. households owned at least one tv set in January. Color tv ownership reached 89% of all households in September (compared with 74% in September, 1975) and multiset ownership is at 55% (compared with 43%).

The share of adults in the average tv household has increased 8 points from 1970 to 75% last year, while the share of child viewers has declined from 21% to about 15%. Both teen agers and women aged 35 to 54 demonstrated increased viewing habits in 1982.

Adult women make up the largest segment of the prime time audience—more than 10.5 million in the average network program audience as of November.#

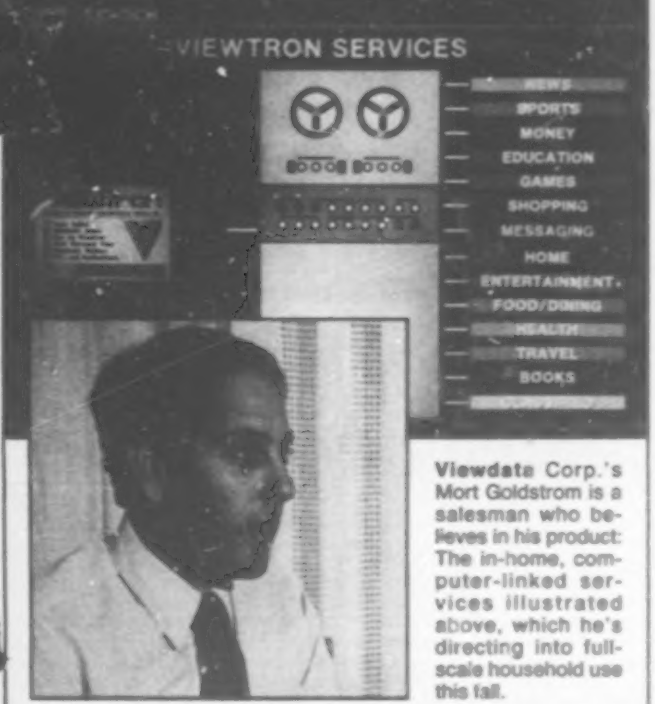
Videotex startup in Florida



Viewdata Corp.'s Mort Goldstrom is a salesman who believes in his product: The in-home, computer-linked services illustrated above, which he's directing into full-scale household use this fall.

Knight-Ridder puts video future on line

By ELIZABETH BRENNER

Miami Beach—"What I hate to do most is wait," says Mort Goldstrom.

"Wait in the morning for the kid to drop the paper in my yard. Wait at night when I come home for the evening news. Wait in line at the bank—that's the worst. If I could find a way to get the information and transact those services when I wanted, I'd jump at it."

Mr. Goldstrom thinks he has the way, and that's what he's busily trying to sell in South Florida. He calls it convenience; in the industry it's called videotex.

More specifically, it's called Viewtron, and it's this country's first commercial videotex system, set to begin initial service to households in three counties here (Dade, Broward and Palm Beach) in September. Mr. Goldstrom is marketing director of Viewdata Corp. of America, a subsidiary of publishing giant Knight-Ridder Newspapers, the company pioneering with Viewtron's introduction.

Mr. Goldstrom, of course, hopes thousands of South Florida families will jump at his way, leading to success for Knight-Ridder's high-stakes gamble. Whether they do or not, there's little doubt that Viewtron's closely watched introduction is going to be a key to the future of videotex. It will begin unlocking answers to many of the nagging questions perplexing thousands of media companies, advertisers and ad agencies curious about the commercial potential of the technology involved.

The Viewtron service features electronic news, information, shopping and banking accessed through a terminal and keypad connected to the home tv set. McCann runs into flak on overseas cigarets

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

New York—McCann-Erickson may have to resign nearly $37 million in combined cigaret business of two other international tobacco clients—Carreras Rothman and British-American Tobacco—in order to succeed BBDO on the worldwide $110 million Camel cigaret account.

The agency already has resigned the estimated $40 million Barclay account, which went to Ogilvy & Mather (AA, May 9).

The startling turn of events surfaced late last week when an RJR spokesman quoted Gerald H. Long, president of R.J. Reynolds Tobacco, the domestic company, as having said, "When McCann accepted the Camel account, they resigned all other cigaret accounts."

A spokesman for Interpublic Group of Cos., McCann's parent, responded that McCann would "live up to its commitment to service the Camel account worldwide," but he could not say for certain whether McCann was resigning $17 million worth of Carreras Rothman business covering 15 international markets as well as roughly $20 million in British-American business in an equal number of markets.

The Interpublic spokesman said McCann's local managers overseas were having "discussions [with BAT and Carreras Rothman] to work out any difficulties. We really don't know exactly what conflicts must be worked out."

Jerry Shively, London-based chairman of McCann/Europe, confirmed that discussions are going on, saying the agency is "engaged in an orderly process to sort out this complicated situation." Mr. Shively is scheduled to be in New York May 16, reportedly to do

Coke douses ad hoc net

By CRAIG REISS

New York—McCann-Erickson has halted its effort to secure rights to theatrical films for an ad hoc tv network.

The decision followed reports that one of its major clients, Coca-Cola Co., withdrew its support for the project.

According to informed sources, Coca-Cola expressed displeasure with McCann-Erickson's plan to strike movie syndication deals with rivals of Columbia Pictures Television, which is related to Coca-Cola. Columbia Pictures is a subsidiary of Coca-Cola Co.

Adventure dots net fare

By DIANE MERMIGAS

The networks next season will be taking cues from hit theatrical films and popular series. Adventure, medical drama and fantasy-based comedy will be the dominant trends in new shows, offset by something offbeat in every schedule.

A tv weatherman inherits a genie in ABC's "Just Our Luck," while Ann Jillian of "Mae West" fame portrays a deceased Hollywood siren whose ghost counsels a wisecracking 14-year-old boy through adolescence in NBC's new "Jennifer Slept Here." In CBS' "The Scarecrow and Mrs. King," Kate Jackson portrays an Erma Bombeck-type housewife who suddenly finds herself a crucial link in the espionage exploits of secret agents.

Tv's cyclical fascination with medicine comes around with CBS' "Cutter to Houston" and ABC's "Trauma Center" joining NBC's heldover "St. Elsewhere." The box office success of "An Officer and a Gentleman" has spawned NBC's airborne recruit drama "For Love and Honor," and the special effects of "An American Werewolf in London" are the obvious creative inspiration for NBC's "Manimal."

The prevailing focus in new series, however, is on adventure that lends itself to plenty of dramatic conflict and stunts. Among the entries are Chad Everett's

Nestea dips in bags as market heats up

By GAY JERVEY

While the tea market awaits Procter & Gamble's impending moves with its acquired Tender Leaf brand, Nestle Co. has slipped into test market with tea bags under its heretofore instant-only Nestea brand.

Nestea's new tea bags are going into Wichita as part of a controlled test conducted by Market Facts. Nestle is bypassing its normal avenue of distribution in that area, its Omaha-based Cain Coffee subsidiary. "We have nothing to do with it," said a sales manager at Cain's Wichita warehouse. "The first time I ever even saw it was yesterday, and that was when I was shopping at my neighborhood store."

Most major area chains say that although they are expecting the product any minute now—by the beginning of this week at the latest—they had not yet received it. A manager at a Dillon's grocery outlet had the product in just two sizes—48-bag and 100-bag boxes. Of the few retailers who actually had the product last week, all reported seeing only those two sizes.

However, Nestle apparently will soon deliver two standard 16-bag and 24-bag boxes as well. The entries, all of which retailers describe as "competitively priced," bear Nestle's signature green and yellow colors.

For its part, Nestle will only say that the test is beginning and that tv and possibly newspaper support are planned, handled by J. Walter Thompson USA. Despite rumors of a Florida test, Wichita is the only current market, although others are under consideration.

In the meantime, the industry is awaiting the apparently imminent P&G introduction of several new tea products—specifically, an instant tea (which would go up against regular Nestea), a decaffeinated tea and an improved tea bag. Tender Leaf, acquired last September from Nabisco Brands, is now a part of P&G's Folger's coffee division.

The $800 million-plus tea market, long described as the quintessential slumbering giant, has suddenly snapped to wide-eyed attention. "To date, there really hasn't been much new activity against the consumer," said Roger Corby, tea marketing manager, Luzianne-Blue Plate Foods Co, New Or-

Keller-Geister wine commercial from Ally & Gargano parodies ad strategies of competitors in rollicking spot that has an Orson Welles type at a party greeting "Ernie and Julie," joining a Cella-type patio party, waving to the Blue Nun and concluding with "We will sell no wine before you pay for it."

Print will survive new media

By EUGENE BACOT
and RANCE CRAIN

BRUSSELS—Three hundred leading publishers, acutely concerned about the challenge of electronic media, heard some comforting words at the 24th world congress of the International Federation of the Periodical Press (FIPP) here, May 11 to 13, from a top European magazine executive.

On the first day publishers were told that electronic media may not be as much of a threat as they feared. The theme of the conference is "Changing times in publishing."

Sir Alex Jarratt, chairman of Reed International Holdings and owner of the International Publishing Co., Europe's largest magazine publisher, said: "I think it unwise to assume that simply because we have discovered lots of new ways of delivering new messages that everyone will want to take receipt of them."

He was making a frequently echoed point, made by many delegates, that conventional print publishers were not being outmoded by the new media and that the demand for well-segmented publications was promising.

According to Mr. Jarratt, the young tv generation is the most attuned to press media, "Women's magazines, for example, find their highest levels of readership among this group—the 15-to-24-year-olds—both in terms of the numbers who read the magazines and the numbers of copies sold."

Tv created readership opportunities that have been seized upon by both book and magazine publishers, he added.

The personal computing segment was highlighted as a publishing opportunity. Drawing on British experience, Mr. Jarratt explained that in 1979 there were 32 magazines concerned with professional computing, while now there are 53. In 1979 there were three journals on personal computing; now there are six produced in the U.K. and 12 im-

Keller's wine tv spot is fine-vintage satire

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

NEW YORK—Were it created in Europe, it would be dubbed new rave advertising. It's hilarious. It's a celebration of advertising craft. It's vintage Ally & Gargano. It's National Distillers' advertising for Keller-Geister German wine.

Not since the days when Stiller & Meara did their comedic hawking for Blue Nun has so much mirth been poured into the advertising of a wine. If you thought Ally & Gargano treated Ma Bell irreverently in its MCI commercial that showed a mother crying not because of a loved one at the other end of the telephone line but because of the size of her phone bill, a barrelful of satire awaits in Keller-Geister's tv and radio advertising.

One tv commercial, in particular, should have a couple of famous brothers in Modesto, Cal., secretly laughing to themselves. Adhering to the premise that any wine that sells for about two bucks a bottle can't hope to be taken seriously, Ally & Gargano goes for laughs in spoofing not only wine barons like Ernest and Julio Gallo, but also the campaigns and ad symbols used by

'Parade,' 'FW' seek new status

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

NEW YORK—Executives of Family Weekly and Parade are trying to convince the Publishers Information Bureau to reclassify the national Sunday newspaper supplements as general-interest magazines.

Were that to happen, PIB's rankings of magazine revenues and pages would undergo major changes, as some longtime leaders would be supplanted by the newcomers.

"We're listed just about anyplace you want to name as a magazine, except PIB," said Carlo Vittorini, Parade's president here. "We don't believe [the figures] reflect what's going on in the general weekly field if we're not in the category.

"If the charter of PIB is to provide accurate, helpful, useful information to the advertising community," he added, "then that's totally inconsistent with the way they're listing us."

Patrick Linskey, publisher here of Family Weekly, agreed. "Our point of view is we very much want to be listed, and considered, as a magazine, because we think we are a magazine," he said. "Any definition, in Webster's or any

Gearing up for an active future

By Brian Rogers

Despite a relatively flat 1982 in the arena of the nation's business press, activity runs high, as do hope and optimism.

Editorial and graphic improvements, mergers, acquisitions, diversification, new technologies and a bright outlook for the U.S. economy—these are the order of the day.

All of which is not to say that everything is rosy for 1983. Says Thomas King, president of the American Business Press (ABP), a 558-member trade publication association, this will be "a tough year for growth." Nonetheless, Mr. King and other leading figures and observers of the industry are looking ahead with great expectations to 1984.

The business press is big business, both in money and in readership. Companies that sell their products to other companies or professionals spend 35.4% of their over-all promotional budgets on space advertising in trade publications, according to a 1982 survey by the Business and Professional Advertising Assn. (BPAA). Last year, ABP member magazines and newspapers carried 1.7 million ad pages, worth some $2.3 billion in ad revenues.

(In general, ad revenues range from $1.5 million to $5 million—although they can go from $250,000 to almost $25 million—per publication.)

According to Business Publications Audit of Circulations, qualified circulations of the ABP member publications average about 38,000 each, ranging from a low of 2,091 to a high of 541,901.

> "Some weaknesses in the business press area parallel weaknesses in the economy today—automotive, steel, natural resources. . . ."

But in general, 1982 was not a good year for the business press. Although ad revenues were up 8% in 1982, it was inflationary growth, a result of rate increases. Ad pages, a better barometer of real growth and new business, were down 2%.

"Some weaknesses in the business press parallel weaknesses in American industry and the economy today—automotive, steel, natural resources," notes veteran communications analyst Edwin Ruzinsky, a partner with and national director of the communications services group of Touche, Ross & Co., a New York-based accounting company.

Meanwhile, the computer and high technology areas of business publishing are what's hot.

And hottest of the hot is Framingham, Mass.-based CW Communications Inc.'s (CWCI) Computerworld, which, according to "The Gallagher Report," was the No. 1 trade publication in gross advertising revenue in the last two years, bringing in $24.6 million in 1982. Currently, CWCI projects over-all revenues of $80 million in 1983.

At McGraw-Hill, New York—the nation's largest business publisher—Paul McPherson, executive vp of the publications division, notes that the company's industrial publications are suffering while the high-tech and medical markets are going strong.

And, because it is hardly ever possible to get too much of a good thing, in the fall McGraw-Hill will be launching a new magazine in one of those strong areas. The startup will be a Japan-based personal computer magazine, a joint venture with a Japanese company, Nikkei.

Brian Rogers is a New York-based business writer.

Gearing up the presses

Additionally, BYTE, a McGraw-Hill consumer magazine published for small businesses with computers and for technically competent users of personal computers, continues to soar to new heights in advertising revenue. Up approximately 1,000 ad pages in 1981, the magazine closed 1982 with 3,968 pages of ads, which represents a gain of 431.

ABP's Thomas King views the tremendous growth of new magazines geared to computers and software as perhaps the most exciting and dramatic recent development in the business press. "Everyone is jumping on the bandwagon," he says.

And indeed they are. John Abely, president of Technical Publishing Co., a subsidiary of Dun & Bradstreet in Barrington, Ill., says that his company's publication, Datamation, has just had "three consecutive strongly up issues back-to-back."

One way to guard against the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune that can occur in individual markets is to diversify, and many publishers are doing just that.

Cleveland-based Penton/IPC's newest magazine, Computer Aided Engineering, is "doing very nicely," according to chairman Thomas Dempsey. And John Fairchild, chairman of Fairchild Publications, New York, wishes only that his company had been faster out of the gate with its new computer publication, MIS-Week.

Yes, all is well in computerland.

As Mr. Ruzinsky points out, however, it is a period of darker days for some of the more traditional American industries. The publications that serve them tell the story.

Natural resources, heavy manufacturing, building and construction: All have been hit hard by the current recession. Again, according to "The Gallagher Report," the following publications were down in advertising pages in 1982: Oil & Gas Journal, 15.1%; Coal Age and Engineering & Mining Journal, 19.8%; Chemical & Engineering News, 26.3%, Power Engineering, 34%; Professional Builder, 30.3%, and Construction Equipment, 28%.

One company that mistimed a new leap into the natural resources field was Whitney Communications Corp., New York. Two years ago, when interest in synthetic fuels was growing and it appeared as though oil prices were going to keep escalating, Whitney purchased Coal Industry News. The intent was to improve the twice-monthly tabloid editorially, then take it weekly and position it as the news medium of the coal industry against the monthlies, Coal Age and Coal Mining & Processing. But the expected increase in the use of coal never happened.

Now, the president of Whitney's magazine division, John Prescott, says the company is trying to decide what to do with Coal Industry News until the time comes when the industry might support such a weekly.

One way to guard against the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune that can occur in individual markets is to diversify. And more and more smart publishers are doing just that—entering other areas of publishing and indeed, other areas of business altogether.

Within Whitney's magazine division, for example, healthy times for Interior Design and Corporate Design have helped to offset both the mishap with Coal Industry News and what has been generally a sluggish period for the company's boating publications. Moreover, Whitney as a whole is a communications company with "three legs on the stool"—newspapers, magazines and cable tv.

And, at Technical Publishing, Mr. Abely says the company has become—in addition to its publishing efforts—"the nation's largest producer of programed training materials." The programs, for example, "train someone who can't hold a hammer into a master mechanic," Mr. Abely explains. They are available in both print and video formats that are sold as packages to companies.

Technical also has its DBI Books division, which publishes and markets large format, vertical interest, soft-cover consumer books, the most successful being "Gun Digest," an annual.

Penton/IPC has moved even further afield, actively pursuing a diversification program into enterprises completely outside of publishing, including a 500-condominium resort development, a direct mail marketing operation serving primarily the ethical drug market and commercial and residential real estate activities, all in the Tampa-Clearwater area of Florida.

Perhaps one of the more intriguing phenomena recently has been the spinning off of successful trade efforts into consumer publications. After the success of Computerworld, CWCI launched InfoWorld and PC World for microcomputer users. McGraw-Hill's BYTE is another example. But maybe the most dramatic spinoff is W, Fairchild Publications' consumer offshoot of Women's Wear Daily. One out of every eight W readers, says Mr. Fairchild, is a millionaire; the readership's household income on the average is $70,000 a year. In addition, Fairchild is producing a network tv show based on W with Paramount Pictures.

Recently, Fairchild launched a consumer version of SportsStyle, a business publication for the active sportswear market. And publication of M, a male version of W and a spinoff of one of Fairchild's oldest business publications, Men's Wear, is scheduled to begin this July or August. It's intended to compete with GQ—Gentlemen's Quarterly.

However, possibly the most fertile and far-reaching area of diversification for business publishers—and a relatively new one—comes from within in the form of "electronic" or "database publishing."

Basically, it's the selling of instant information via computer. The two major types of services provided are: Data retrieval (for example, calling up the editorial content of a given publication) and, two, the ability to transmit fast-breaking news or information. To receive the information, which is constantly updated, users need an on-line terminal.

Often, the publishers source material is transferred to a third party that markets it as part of a larger databank, paying the publisher a royalty for each request. Less frequently, publishers market their information directly via their own networks.

A leader in electronic publishing, McGraw-Hill Publications Co. is already marketing many database services through another M-H division, DRI, and through Mead Data Central's NEXIS.

And just four months ago, McGraw-Hill launched Electronic Marketing Information Service (EMIS), which it is marketing directly. Mr. McPherson calls EMIS "the next real jump in electronic publishing." It is being operated as a joint venture with I.P. Sharpe Corp., which, according to Mr. McPherson, already has an electronic network set up that reached 500 cities in the world.

EMIS provides oil and chemical buyers with current information on prices, currency conversion rates and tariff regulations in different countries. It also provides such esoteric data as the level of the Rhine River (because of the river's heavy shipping traffic) and the availability and locations of ships for cargo purposes. Users of the service are able to buy and sell products right through the system from their terminals.

On another note, mergers and acquisitions have slowed considerably from their more dramatic days years ago when American Broadcasting Cos. acquired Chilton, International Thomson Business Press purchased Litton Industries' publishing division (now Medical Economics Co.) and American Express Co. made its unfriendly takeover bid, which ultimately failed, for McGraw-Hill.

Yet acquisitions continue, only on a smaller scale. The larger companies are picking up fairly small companies and often just one or two publications at a time.

ABC recently added COMPUTE! Publications, a small Greensboro, N.C., company to its roster of publishing concerns, and International Thomson recently entered the financial services market, picking up the American Banker and Bond Buyer, which previously had been privately owned.

As trade publishing becomes increasingly competitive—in 1973, there were 463 ABP member publications and today there are 558—all publications, business and consumer, must compete that much more for people's time.

"People are not going to devote the time to leafing through page after page of the old-time business press that used to take just product news and throw it in there to fill up around the ads," notes Mr. Prescott, president of Whitney Communication's magazine division.

For the big stories in their fields, trade publications also face stronger and stronger competition from newspapers, consumer magazines and network tv—largely because of the public interest in the economy that has grown out of the instability of the last decade.

"The business sections of the New York Times, the Washington Post and the Los Angeles Times have become so good," Mr. Fairchild observes, "that people who are in the business press have had to get better."

Mr. King suggests, "Some magazines in some older, manufacturing-type industries" may not make it.

"The publishers of those magazines are going to have to be a lot quicker on their feet to survive and prosper this year, next year and probably the year after that," he says.

In the long term, says Mr. Ruzinsky of Touche Ross, the "big are going to get bigger. The strong are going to get stronger." He adds, "Share of market is going to be a 'must,' which means somebody's going to get hurt in the process."

On the other hand, Mr. King points out that he still sees a lot of small entrepreneurs—lots of people with a good idea, a couple of smart editors and a few salespeople trying to get into the business.

Computer books grow, bit by bit

CWCI cultivates an international bumper crop

By Charlene Canape

In May, 1967, Patrick J. McGovern, founder of International Data Corp., was having lunch on Wall Street with some of his employes. The topic of discussion was an IDC survey that had determined computer users were not getting the most up-to-date information available on the computer industry. Mr. McGovern, who is president and chief executive officer as well as founder of the Framingham, Mass.-based computer research company, had a solution: Start a magazine to address those needs and have the first issue ready in three weeks, in time to pass out at the national computer show.

That was the beginning of what is now CW Communications/Inc. (CWCI). "We were not in the publishing business before, and we had no idea that launching a new publication is normally a process that takes six to nine months," explains Mr. McGovern. "We wrote the stories, went to the printer and took the copies to the computer show.

"To our amazement, people starting crowding around, snatching up the issue and asking how to subscribe. There was a lot of interest."

Back when he was a newcomer to the business press industry, Mr. McGovern thought his publishing venture would be small, compared with the main business of the company. But these days, the tail is wagging the dog. For 1983, projections estimate that CWCI will account for $80 million out of a total of $110 million in revenues for International Data Group. (The International Data Group was formed in the mid-1970s as a holding company for the two subsidiaries, CWCI and International Data Corp.) CWCI is expected to grow at an annual rate of 40%, says company president Walter Boyd, and the group itself is expected to reach the $1 billion mark by 1990, says Mr. McGovern.

According to Jack Edmonston, group vp-communication services, CWCI's first publication, Computerworld, had a paid circulation of 124,228 in March and in 1982 had $28.5 million in ad revenues and 5,163 ad pages.

Spurred on by the success of Computerworld, Mr. McGovern added three other publications —InfoWorld, ISO World and PC World—each addressing the needs of computer users in specific segments of the market.

In addition, Mr. McGovern has taken his expertise in computer publishing abroad. He now has computer publications in 18 countries and predicts he will have publications in 40 countries by 1990.

CWCI's growth mirrors the growth of the computer industry. When Computerworld was first published, the computer industry consisted primarily of big marketers selling to big users. As the prices for computers went down, and with the advent of the microcomputer for business and personal use, more middlemen and consumers came into the market, looking for information to help them make purchasing decisions.

MICROFLOPPY DRIVES: THE MARKET

FLOP THE FLOPPY AND SAVE THE SALE

Spurred on by the success of Computerworld, CWCI added InfoWorld, ISO World and PC World.

"In the old days, when IBM went out and sold a $4 million computer, it could afford a dedicated salesman for each project," notes Mr. Boyd. "Now with micros selling for much less, it just cannot afford those kinds of individual sales calls."

These days, Mr. McGovern knows a great deal more about the publishing industry than when he started. He now takes six to eight months to launch a new publication. There is, however, the exception. "In some cases, it's still better to move quickly," he says. "In Sweden [this year], we launched a new computer magazine in two weeks."

As with Computerworld's startup, the birth of PC World, CWCI's most recent U.S. publication, was rather unusual. Mr. McGovern had been ready to buy a publication called PC Magazine in San Francisco. When he arrived to sign the papers, however, he found the major investor had sold the publication the night before to Ziff-Davis Publishing Co. in New York. According to Mr. McGovern, 41 of the 45 staff members of PC Magazine walked out and came to him with a proposal for launching a competing magazine. He accepted. Mr. McGovern claims that PC World set a record for the most number of advertising pages in a first issue of a computer magazine, 200.

While PC World has been greeted with enthusiasm, CWCI has had more difficulty marketing Framingham, Mass.-based ISO World. The publication, originally called Computer Business News, was launched by Mr. McGovern in 1978.

The magazine's name was changed in October to ISO World (ISO stands for independent sales organizations). "The new name more properly reflects the marketplace of today," says Mr. Boyd.

Before its name change, the magazine lost an estimated $4 million. "It started as a trade paper focusing on the business side," says Stewart Alsop II, the editor. "It was never well focused or defined." The publication now has a controlled circulation of 32,000, he says, and makes its revenues solely from advertising. Since October, 1982, the magazine has taken in $1.5 million in advertising.

CWCI has had more success with its consumer magazine InfoWorld, based in Palo Alto, Cal. Started in 1980 to service the owners of desk top computers, the publication has enthusiastic admirers.

"InfoWorld does excellent product and software reviews," says David M. Simons, president of New York-based Digital Video Corp. "It runs pieces on personal computers which add a perspective you don't often get. It has good news coverage and digs deeper than even Computerworld."

InfoWorld has many competitors, but the chief among them is McGraw-Hill's BYTE, which had a hefty 348 ad pages in its March issue. But, as Mr. Boyd notes, the potential audience is large. "It goes to the professional user of desk top computers," he says. "That can range from the consumer to doctors, lawyers, architects, to a lot of people running small businesses that are beginning to computerize." In 1982, InfoWorld had $3.6 million in ad revenues and 2,347 ad pages.

Computerworld itself has changed over the years as the computer industry has evolved. When it began, Computerworld tended to concentrate on the large marketers of mainframe computers, but now the publication takes a broader view, covering minicomputers and microcomputers as well.

"Other magazines try to service one niche," says editor John Whitmarsh. "Computerworld tries to take an over-all view."

Computerworld also has continued to be a source of new ideas for other CW Communications' books. This month, the company is adding Computerworld on Communications to its list. This special edition is scheduled to come out twice annually and will deal in depth with data and business communications.

And then there is Computerworld OA, covering office automation. Started in 1982, it is Shops show 1st-quarter gains

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

New York—The proverbial light at the end of the tunnel may be visible to a good many agencies now that a majority of publicly owned shops posted solid gains in the first quarter of 1983, a period that generally is the lowest contributor of the four for agencies.

As in the past, the revenues would have been higher if they hadn't been affected adversely by the strengthened dollar. As Robert Jacoby, chairman of privately held Ted Bates Worldwide, said: "Some people go to St. Patrick's to pray for salvation. I go to pray for the weakening of the dollar."

In terms of net income, only Ogilvy & Mather, with its slight 4.2% increase, had a flat quarter. Biggest gainer was JWT Group, up to $1.1 million, from a loss of $47,000 in the first quarter of 1982, when the agency disclosed "accounting irregularities" in its syndication unit and wrote off $30 million in pretax revenues.

Now a majority owner of Simmons Market Research Bureau, JWT's income included SMRB's income for the first time. Gains were attributed to a turnaround profit in the recruitment division and improved results in the U.S. and European operations of JWT Co. and its subsidiary Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein.

Grey Advertising, up 45% from the same period in 1982, came in as the second-biggest gainer, with Doyle Dane Bernbach third.

DDB showed an increase of 41%, a gain credited to increased ad spending by clients in New York and its Fletcher/Mayo/Associates subsidiary.

Mickelberry, parent of Cunningham & Walsh, Nadler & Larimer and Laurence, Charles & Free, among others, had a net of $512,000, up 26%.

The biggest loser in terms of net income was Foote, Cone & Belding, down 56.7%. The decline was attributed to the stronger dollar and high non-U.S. taxes.

Interpublic Group of Cos. also had a whopping drop in net income in the first quarter—down 45.3%. Philip Geier, Interpublic chairman-chief executive, blamed the drop in income to increased losses from foreign exchange currencies, an increase in the tax rate as a result of losses from certain foreign operations and the continuing recession outside the U.S.

On the revenue side, Mickelberry posted the greatest gain, up 104%. The increase reflected the earnings of Cunningham & Walsh, acquired in March, 1982.

No other agencies showed quite such dramatic first-quarter gains. Interpublic was up 24%. BBDO was up 22% for the period. The agency's 1983 domestic revenues include the full consolidation of Tracy-Locke/BBDO in Dallas.

Citing acquisition of such business as S.C. Johnson & Son, Data General, Cinzano and Stokely-Van Camp, FCB president Norman Brown wrote shareholders, "On a consolidated basis, we believe that for the full year 1983, FCB will have an earnings improvement in the range of 5% to 10%."#

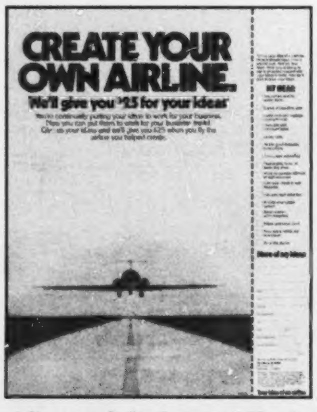
Midway ads ask traveler preferences

By SCOTT HUME

Chicago—Financially troubled Midway Airlines is asking for suggestions from prospective customers in its continuing effort to reposition itself as a carrier that caters to business travelers.

Ads appearing in business magazines and dailies in several of Midway's 14 markets invite readers to "Create your own airline" by indicating which of a listed series of airline services they consider important when traveling on business. Some of the descriptions, such as "All seats one price," already apply to Midway. Others, like "Copier at boarding gate," are services not now provided nor are general amenities ("Great snacks, well-presented") or features popular with everyone ("Lower fares").

The ads, placed by Zwiren & Wagner, Chicago, offer a check for $25 to all who respond and fly round trip before Nov. 15 "on the airline you helped create." No airline is named in the ads.



"We launched the ads primarily to create a data and information base," said a Midway spokesman.

Like most airlines, Midway has experienced substantial losses in recent months. For its first quarter, it announced a net loss of $5.9 million on revenue of $20.2 million. Its passenger count was 30.3% above the year-earlier level, but its load factor was down from 47.9% in 1982 to 44.3% this year. Chairman Arthur Bass attributed the size of the loss to continued fare discounting by the major airlines.#

other dictionary, would identify us as magazines."

The rankings of PIB list nine categories of magazines, such as monthlies, home and youth. Their pages and revenues are summed up under a heading, "Magazine total."

At the end of the reports comes a category called Sunday supplements and sections. The pages and revenues of three publications—Family Weekly, New York Times Magazine and Parade—are summed up under a heading, "Supplements total." The "over-all total," adding together both the magazines and the supplements, then is provided.

"As it's shown now," Mr. Vittorini said, "we're considered as an odd creature tacked on at the end, and if somebody looks there, fine." This categorization is restrictive and inaccurate, he said, because "an unfair advantage is given to other magazines. Our intent is to see the advertising community is provided access to our statistics under reasonable category classifications."

When the supplements are "segmented out," Mr. Linskey said, "they're trying to relegate us to the position, 'Don't think of them and maybe you won't buy them.'

The supplements have asked PIB several times to change their status to regular member from associate member, most recently about a month ago.

The PIB board "decided their status should remain as it has been," said Bob Farley, vp, PIB, "as associate members. The board feels, as it has felt for several years, there is a distinction between magazines and Sunday supplements and it should continue to exist. There are a number of distinct differences, several the board thinks are significant." He declined to detail them, citing the confidentiality of discussions at board meetings.

Getting the supplements' status changed "is certainly something we intend to pursue," Mr. Linskey said. "I really don't think there is any other way but persevering." Parade will "continue to seek what is justifiably ours," Mr. Vittorini said. "We intend to pursue the matter. . .We're putting together a program we're going to pursue back to PIB."#

ported from the U.S.

"Few publishers are making much in the way of profits from electronic publishing, but many regard their investment as vital to their future growth," he said.

Electronic media is an opportunity for print publishers—not a threat, according to William Broyles, editor-in-chief of Newsweek. "I enjoy the irony that the technology which was supposed to bury us has generated a lot of new magazines," such as cable and computer publications, he told the meeting. "The magazine is the perfect information cassette. It's portable, permanent and you can direct the use of it at your own pace."

Huib Boermans, managing director of the VNU Magazine Group, told FIPP delegates how one of his Dutch magazines, Libelle, regained its top position in the women's magazine field. The editorial and marketing staffs of the magazine cooperate to develop "unique selling points" to attract nonreaders.

But Mr. Boermans said money alone isn't the entire answer to a successful magazine restaging. "There is no point to spending large amounts of money on temporary circulation boosts; this type of short-term success doesn't lead anywhere. The funds Libelle had at hand for editorial and marketing purposes were viewed as one and the same by the editorial and marketing staff."

Both staffs, as part of implementing an editorial marketing budget, make joint decisions on what covers to run, since "there was no point to advertising Libelle if that particular week's issue didn't have some specific angle to it." The editorial marketing budget also involves publishing about 35 editorial inserts a year, such as separate brochures and posters.

Hearst Corp. licenses 64 editions of its various publications—including 18 for Cosmopolitan—in 20 countries with a total circulation of almost 5 million. According to Brian Braithwaite, publisher and director of Hearst's U.K. subsidiary, National Magazine Co., the British Cosmo, launched in 1972, has a circulation of about 430,000, making it the leading young women's magazine in the country. The newest Cosmo edition is in Holland (launched in March, 1982) and "everything points to a break-even by the second year," said Hanny van den Horst, vp, United Dutch Publishing Cos. (VNU).

The mixed performance of 175 information providers of the Prestel videotex service in the U.K. has inhibited its growth, according to Cees VerVoord, general manager of Kluwer Technical Periodicals in the Netherlands. Prestel in the U.K. currently has 10% of its 250,000-set target. Italy has 1,500 videotex sets in use, Holland 6,000, France 2,500 and Germany 7,000. Mr. Ver Voord said quality of the information providers must be improved, prices reduced and commercial use expanded for videotex services in Europe to succeed.#

leans. "But all that's beginning to change. A lot is happening right now," he added. Market leader Thomas J. Lipton Inc. is testing a caffeine-free version of its tea bags in upstate New York (AA, May 2).

A big question posed by observers—and one that Nestle answers equivocally—is just how Nestle will promote its new tea bags. Will it be pushed as a hot drink, iced drink or as a switch-hitter?

Nestea—indeed, all instant teas—have found the Southeast and Southwest recalcitrant markets, at best. "In these areas of the country, people just don't buy much iced-tea mix," Luzianne's Mr. Corby said.

Apparently Nestle is quite aware of this cultural juggernaut. Several sources say that in 1981 the company officially investigated why consumers in the land of mint juleps and magnolias find instant iced tea so difficult to swallow. What Nestle reportedly discovered boiled down to this: That's the way tea's always been prepared, and it's not a region quick to change.

Tea Council figures show that the company is moving with the times. Over the last five years, the tea-bag segment of the tea market has shown consistent, determined growth. In 1982, tea bags comprised 57.8% of the over-all market, versus 50.2% in 1977. And, according to Tea Council executive Don Wiederecht, "At least one-half—or maybe more—of tea bags are used for iced tea."#

BK will push pita, platter

Miami—Starting in July, Burger King will be national with its new salad bar and the suggestion that patrons "Eat a pita" or, if they prefer, "Eat a platter."

New tv spots for the salad bars (AA, April 25) incorporate the chain's current "Aren't you hungry?" theme, eschewing the flame-broiled burgers. The J. Walter Thompson USA-created commercials explain the uses of the pita pocket (a piece of round, flat bread that is slit open so food can be stuffed into it), and that salad platters also are available.

The salad bar includes 23 salad fixings and six salad dressings. Those choosing the all-you-can-eat salad platter can expect to pay between $2.10 and $2.20. The salad-stuffed pita carries a suggested 99¢ price tag.

The network tv blitz breaks after July 4. Burger King will use prime time, fringe and, for the first time, daytime soap operas. Radio, outdoor and print will support. BK's heavy magazine schedule is directed toward women and consumers with a concern for diet and nutrition. "We get a positive food quality halo over everything we serve by serving salad," said Steve Bowen, JWT senior vp-management supervisor.#

Court OKs end of radio ad limit

Washington—Despite qualms about "blatant commercial excesses," a three-judge U.S. circuit court of appeals panel last week upheld the 1981 Federal Communications Commission decision to abandon its 18-minutes-per-hour benchmark for overcommercialization on radio.

FCC said the marketplace would curb ad clutter on radio. The National Assn. of Broadcasters contended that only a handful of radio stations had met or exceeded the 18-minute mark during the eight years the guideline was in place. The court opinion also upheld the FCC's decision to drop similar quantitative guidelines setting benchmarks for news and information programing on radio stations and its decision to eliminate the requirement that stations survey their communities to ascertain community needs and issues.#

Four A's forecast is sunny

White Sulphur Springs, W. Va.—In contrast to last year's American Assn. of Advertising Agencies annual meeting here, when the skies were bright and the mood gloomy, this year's record gathering was marked by optimism, even as occasional rain marred the all-important golf and tennis tournaments.

Executives from both small and large agencies—most with good first quarters behind them—expressed confidence about the ad business for the rest of 1983.

At the same time, however, they are looking for ways to ease a profit squeeze that is reducing the percentage of billings or gross income that makes it to the bottom line. One approach mentioned by many of the more than 800 attendees: More use of fees.

But "we're out of the dark as far as the recession goes" said Brian Sherwood, senior vp at Geer, DuBois, New York, summing up the prevailing view at the 3½-day meeting at the Greenbrier that ended Saturday. " '83 looks terrific," said Ed Eskandarian, president of Humphrey Browning MacDougall, Boston.

John O'Toole, chairman of Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, noted that "anything would be better than '82," a year in which the agency lost important accounts such as British Airways and Hallmark Cards. FCB has been adding substantial new business this year.

Smaller-agency executives were also optimistic. Joseph E. Anderson, president of Warren Anderson Advertising, Davenport, Ia., said he was having a good year in the Quad Cities area of Iowa-Illinois. However, facing an 18% unemployment rate in Iowa, the agency

Erlicht to get top program post at ABC

By MORRIE GELMAN

Los Angeles—Tony Thomopoulos, the chief architect of ABC-TV programing for the last five years, will be leaving as president of ABC Entertainment, Advertising Age has learned.

He will be succeeded by Lewis H. Erlicht, senior vp for prime time programing.

The change may not be effective until the first of next year. It's believed that Mr. Thomopoulos will remain at ABC, based in New York and probably reporting to Fred Pierce, president-chief operating officer of ABC Inc.

Mr. Thomopoulos, made aware that a story about his replacement as head of ABC Entertainment was being prepared, said: "I've made no plans at all; I'm still in this job." But, he acknowledged, "One day, I'm sure, it's going to happen," noting that he had been in the post five years now. A spokesman for ABC, while neither confirming nor denying that Mr. Erlicht would succeed Mr. Thomopoulos, pointed out that "in situations where things are said to be happening, it's our policy not to comment."

The change at the ABC programing helm has been rumored for several months. The position Mr. Thomopoulos has held since February, 1978, calls for providing the entertainment programing on the ABC tv network and for developing its programs and talent, among other responsibilities. While ABC was No. 1 in prime time ratings when Mr. Thomopoulos took office, it has been second to CBS since the 1979-80 season.

In the prime time ratings competition that concluded in April, ABC was a close second, but more thanks go to miniseries and special programing such as "The Winds of War" and "The Thorn Birds" than to regular programing.

The network is sorely lacking in new hit series. Such hopefuls as "Joanie Loves Chachi" and "Ryan's Four" have not proved successful. There is no Tom Selleck (CBS) nor "Hill Street Blues" (NBC) among ABC's new crop of

Interpublic tames the West

By JENNIFER PENDLETON and CHRISTY MARSHALL

"One of the major opportunities for future growth is right here in the United States," chairman Philip H. Geier Jr. told shareholders of agency conglomerate Interpublic Group of Cos. last week. He then informed them that IPG had acquired a Los Angeles-based ad agency he termed "the gem of the West," the $135 million Dailey International Group and its main subsidiary, Dailey & Associates.

For Interpublic, the $22 million acquisition is an important advance. It gives the giant holding company a stronger presence in the West, especially in Los Angeles, where its McCann-Erickson and SSC&B offices have shown lackluster-to-disappointing performances. It also places it more firmly in San Francisco, where Interpublic is only represented by McCann.

With Dailey, Interpublic adds the West's largest independent, an agency whose billings have increased dramatically throughout its 15-year history. In 1967, when agency chairman Peter Dailey bought the then West Coast division of Detroit's Campbell-Ewald (prior to IPG's buy of C-E), its billings were a modest $8 million. Last year, a difficult time for most in advertising, Dailey's $100 million-plus billings rose a robust 25%.

7UP ads to hit artificial ingredients

Competitors don't feel good about 7UP

By ROBERT REED
and NANCY GIGES

Seven-Up Co.'s assault on the soft-drink industry accelerates this month, as it introduces a combative marketing attack for the 7UP brand that chides competitors for using artificial flavors and colorings—ingredients it claims aren't in the lemon-lime drink.

The anticipated campaign is reviving hostilities among major competitors and their bottlers toward the Philip Morris subsidiary. Coca-Cola Co. has responded with a strong letter to its bottlers condemning Seven-Up's actions as "insidious," and will be counterattacking with new advertising for Sprite, its own lemon-lime drink.

Dr Pepper Co. states its laboratory tests found 7UP to contain artificial ingredients (sodium citrate and citric acid), and it plans to bring that to the attention of the networks.

While some Seven-Up bottlers are supportive of the effort, others that carry both a major cola and 7UP are angered over the new approach.

One of the three commercials set to appear in the new campaign features 7UP spokesman Geoffrey Holder, who unapprovingly looks at cans of Pepsi Free, RC 100 and Sunkist and says 7UP differs because it "has no artificial coloring or flavors. No wonder 7UP has that crisp, clean and unspoiled taste." Mr. Holder concludes the spot with the continuing tag: "Don't you feel good about 7UP?"

Other commercials also contain hard-edged comparisons and picture major brands from every flavor category. Included are Coke, Diet Coke, RC Cola, Dr Pepper, A&W and Hires root beers and Crush, according to sources who have viewed the spots. One spot even includes Like, Seven-Up's cola entry.

Seven-Up officials would not comment on the new N W Ayer-created campaign, which is officially being announced this week.

The anti-coloring and additive tactic builds on the brand's already controversial "no-caffeine" approach. That effort premiered last year and was greeted with a hail of protests from competitors who feared it raised an unfounded "health" issue.

Yet the campaign is a success—it helped give 7UP its first sales increase since 1973—and now all major competitors have caffeine-free players.

Last year the brand jumped to a 5.2% market share (310 million cases) over 1981's 5% and enjoyed a 7.8% volume sale growth—and in some areas saw double-digit jumps, according to Manny Goldman, analyst with Montgomery Securities, San Francisco.

Once again, Seven-Up is zinging an industry nerve. A spot check of bottlers found that support is mixed for the anti-additive and flavoring campaign. One root beer marketer said the bottlers that carried his brand and 7UP were thrilled with the new approach, and believe it will spur growth similar to the caffeine-free effort.

"If you had asked me about this type of approach a year ago, I would have said they were out of their minds," said George Horrigan, general manager of Mid-Continent Bottling, Des Moines. "But, after a year of double-digit growth [for 7UP], you have to say, 'God love you,' because they know what the consumer wants."

NBC affiliates see day-light

By CRAIG REISS and BOB MARICH

Los Angeles—The NBC-TV affiliates meeting here last week turned into "The Steve Sohmer Show," as the senior vp of NBC Entertainment dazzled his audience with a sparkling promotional package and some tough talk about turning around the morbid daytime at the No. 3 network.

It was Mr. Sohmer's performance that contributed most to the generally enthusiastic attitude of the affiliates at the annual meeting last week.

While serious issues remain for the network, including the rapid decline of affiliate faith in the network's news programing, the soft ratings of "The Tonight Show" and the inability of NBC to gain in daytime, most affiliates appeared confident that the right management team was in place to turn things around.

In the pep-rally atmosphere of the affiliates meeting, many said they would be ready to clear more daytime network hours if NBC can deliver the kinds of shows promised by Mr. Sohmer, the network's promotion chief who recently was assigned to oversee daytime and children's programing.

"The mood of the affiliates is higher than I have ever

May sweeps tight as NBC improves

By JAMES P. FORKAN

New York—The May sweeps ratings continued to be an unusually tight horse race among the three tv networks, thanks mainly to NBC's sharp improvement over year-ago levels as CBS and ABC stayed roughly level.

After the first 19 days of the sweeps—which began on April 17 in Arbitron's view—CBS averaged a 15.3 homes rating, just three-tenths of a point ahead of its two rivals, which were tied at 15.0.

In Nielsen's book, CBS again led, but with a 15.4 rating average after 18 days, since its report began on April 28. NBC tallied a 14.9 to ABC's 14.8.

ABC won Wednesday May 18 handily, but the Nielsens for the three nights up to that point showed ABC and NBC tied at 16.2 in homes rating. CBS averaged a 14.1 for May 16-18. ABC's Wednesday tv movie special "Travis McGee" built considerably on its "Fall Guy" lead-in. CBS followed with a low-rated "E.T. & Friends" hour and Procter & Gamble's "Country Comes Home," a music special that ran second in its two-hour span. NBC limped along, with "Facts of Life" its highest rater of that night.

Ratings for May 16 showed NBC overwhelming the competition with its two-hour "Motown 25" special on Motown Records' star-studded anniversary celebration, followed by ABC's three-hour "Death on the Nile" theatrical rerun. That gave NBC its second Monday win in three

Personal computers boil over

By CHUCK WINGIS
and RUTH STROUD

Anaheim—The ever-growing list of contenders in the booming personal computer market may have at last stretched the framework of the National Computer Conference beyond all reasonable limits.

With an unprecedented number of personal and business microcomputer makers numbered among some 680 exhibitors, this 10th annual conference and show completely overwhelmed Anaheim exhibition facilities. The four-day event last week took over 325,000 sq. ft. in the convention center, the Disneyland Hotel and temporary exhibition tents in the center parking lot.

Hot weather sent temperatures inside the poorly ventilated tents to well over 100 degrees, pushing the 277 exhibitors located there into an angry confrontation with the American Federation of Information Processing Societies (AFIPS), the show sponsor. Many were forced [illegible] down equipment to prevent heat damage.

Still, an unofficial estimate placed show attendance at over 120,000 visitors, another all-time record for the conference and

Where does the time (off) go?

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR
and CHRISTY MARSHALL

NEW YORK—Since last fall, a delightful pastime has been shared by most of the thousands of people who toil at advertising agencies. It is the matter of deciding how, when and where one's vacation weeks will be spent between Memorial Day and Labor Day.

However, the number of weeks one can devote to swimming, surfing, reading novels, fishing, falling in love, doing absolutely nothing or climbing mountains is subject to two conditions—how long one has been working for an agency and, more importantly, the agency's formula for determining how much time off its people are entitled to take.

■ Based upon an ADVERTISING AGE survey of agencies, some people can look forward to three weeks' vacation after just one year. Others must content themselves with two weeks off annually despite 10 or more years with the company. Remarkably, one agency's vacation policy is based upon salary levels: Below $10,000, two weeks; over $10,000, three weeks. Four weeks' vacation is generally the most vacation one can expect in the agency business, although at one shop, McCann-Erickson, six weeks off are enjoyed by employes with 30 or more years' service.

Amil Gargano, president-chief executive officer at Ally & Gargano, appears to have summed up the view of agency top management toward vacations when he said, "Due to the high degree of work and the inordinate amount of pressure in the advertising business, it's important that people take time off when they can to rejuvenate themselves physically and psychologically." Mr. Gargano also noted that while his agency has a fixed (and liberal) vacation policy, ideally he envisions the day when A&G employes can take time off after completing a project that has forced them to cram an unusual amount of work into a short period.

What does he do when he can fit in some vacation time? "I may do nothing. But I do like sailing and tennis. I find both to be physical and tranquilizing," he replied.#

Sales growth slowdown sobers U.S. wineries

By RUTH STROUD

SAN FRANCISCO—The International Wine Exposition held here was a sobering experience for a number of U.S. wineries, but a heady one for some international marketers who came to show off their increasingly competitive brands to the trade.

The domestic wine industry, riding the crest of a 6% annual growth rate over the last several years, faced the reality that it was not immune to the recession and some of the same foreign trade pressures that have plagued the American auto industry.

Sales were flat (up 1.8%) last year compared to imported shipments which increased about 6% to represent nearly a quarter of the U.S. market.

Speakers and observers at the Expo related the slowdown, particularly in the California wine industry (which represents 90% of U.S. produced wines) to several factors: A 100 million-gal. surplus that is a legacy of the record 1982 grape harvest in California; government-backed promotions and subsidies of French, Italian and other European wines in this country while the opposite does not apply to U.S. wine marketers competing overseas; the falling value of foreign currency against the American dollar, which permits importers to sell wines they ship into the U.S. at bargain prices; the failure of the domestic wine industry to market wine as a "friendly" beverage to be enjoyed with food, rather than a vintage whose name consumers can't even pronounce, and wine marketers' neglect of new consumers in pursuit of the known wine lover.

"There are too many wineries producing too many wines for too few people," John C. Senkevich, president-chief operating officer of Geyser Peak Winery, Geyserville, Cal., told the roomful of wine producers, wholesalers, distributors, retailers and other members of the trade.

Geyser Peak pioneered several new wine-packaging concepts, starting with its 1975 introduction of its Summit brand Wine-In-A-Box and continuing with the Summit Wine-in-A-Can six-pack and a 1.5-liter plastic bottle. The latter, introduced in fall, 1980, hasn't quite caught on yet, Mr. Senkevich said, but the cans, first distributed on airlines, and the box are doing well.

Terrence Clancy, president of a San Francisco consulting company that bears his name, observed that survival of wineries in the future would depend as much on how they price their products against competitors as to how they advertise and market them. Of California's 550 wineries (up from 165 in 1975), more than three-fourths of them sold their wines for over $5 a bottle, when only 4% to 6% of the American consumers drink wine at that price.

The competitive conditions vis-a-vis other U.S. wineries and those abroad won't change, he warned. Even E&J Gallo Winery, with almost 27% share of the market, hasn't been exempt from price-cutting, he said.

Mr. Clancy was extremely skeptical about the possibility of a cooperative campaign between wineries to promote wine consumption among nondrinkers. "It's been one of the false hopes of this industry for many years, that we would all love one another and join together in this great crusade to introduce table wine to each other, like some great church service. I think that's nonsense. It won't happen for one preeminent reason—that one guy [Ernest Gallo] does 30% of the business, and he's not going to do it. Why should he? This is America, this is the competitive world."

In a separate interview, wine industry consultant Louis R. Gomberg, painted a gloomy picture of the future of the American wine industry without such a promotion. Both Italy and France, the first and second-largest exporters, have heavy nonbrand programs in support of their wines, and, like other foreign marketers, are delighted to ship over here, since Europe is experiencing its own wine glut, he said. The foreign wine importers have grown from about 5% of the market after World War II to close to 25% last year, while California wineries' share of market has fallen from over 90% to under 70% in the same period, Mr. Gomberg said.

"The U.S. is still in the primitive stages of wine development. Nothing has happened to upgrade the U.S. from the minimal to the moderate stage of consumption," he said. But, he added, the reaction against such a promotion would probably be insurmountable.#

Direct marketing consultants join to form network

NEW YORK—Kestnbaum & Co., Chicago, and Peter J. Rosenwald, New York, independent direct marketing consultant services, have joined with five other direct marketing consultants and companies to form a new network, International Associates. Based in Zurich, Switzerland, International Associates' other founding members are Walter Schmid, director, International Direct Marketing Symposium, Zurich; Pietro Sanfelice, president, I.P.S., Milan, Italy; Jean Larue, director, Jean Larue & Associates, Paris; Lief Fogelberg, chief executive, Direct Marketing Associates, Helsingborg, Sweden, and Gregory Carley, chief executive, Chateau Blanc, Tokyo. Mr. Rosenwald said that in addition to general direct marketing counsel, IA offers planning, product development, catalogs, database marketing and fulfillment, distribution, list development, management, telephone selling and interactive new electronic media programs.

Growth in smokeless; cigars in decline

By JOHN C. MAXWELL JR.

The smokeless tobacco business was a mixed bag last year. Chewing tobacco suffered a modest over-all volume decline of 0.3%, with the largest decreases experienced in the plug categories. The more interesting is the so-called moist snuff/-fine-cut area, which gained more than 8%.

In this category, U.S. Tobacco led, with Conwood picking up the most market share. General Tobacco was up modestly. There is a general feeling that the younger generation may be going directly into this area rather than cigarets, and the demographic makeup is skewed toward the younger groupings. Both Pinkerton and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco are testing new products; in fact, Pinkerton is trying out a generic entry.

The loose leaf/moist-plug area is more tied to older blue-collar workers, and is more job-oriented. As the economy picks up, it is possible that we may see better growth from this sector.

- In the more traditional chewing tobacco area, Conwood and U.S. Tobacco continue to gain market share, while Pinkerton's share has declined slightly. Conwood remained in first place in the industry, with a 25.4% share. (Scotten Dillon is now included in the Conwood total because of a licensing agreement it has with that company.) U.S. Tobacco moved into second place in the industry with 23.6%, bypassing Pinkerton with its 22.8% share of the 1982 market.

As an aside, it is interesting to note that loose leaf is packed in a 3-oz. pouch, while moist snuff/fine cut comes in a 1.2-oz. can. Therefore, if one were to translate Pinkerton's loose-leaf pouches into units, they would add up to 150 million pouches, while U.S. Tobacco probably sells close to 388 million cans of moist snuff/fine cut.

Cigar Market

The cigar industry accelerated its decline in 1982, presumably because of the economy. While we do not see the industry bottoming out this year, we do think the decline will be less.

Some industry executives are hoping for an uptick in the next few years. They base this on the aging of the population, as well as increases in recreational time. One area that continues to do extremely well is high-price cigars (50¢ or more), which jumped 5.2% in units last year, to 13.9 million. We feel this area will continue to increase.

As far as individual companies are concerned, John H. Swisher had the biggest jump in share, up almost a full point. It appears to have the only interesting new cigar in test, Swisher Sweets, a sweet coronella selling for 10¢. Initial tests look good, and we would not be surprised to see this product on our charts next year.

Bayuk Cigars was liquidated, with Phillies sold to Havatampa and Garcia y Vega sold to General Cigar. This was the primary reason for increases in market share for both companies. Consolidated was up half a point, but Backwoods topped out last year and we expect lower numbers for it in '83. In the little-cigar area, Consolidated's Dutch Treats was the only product with an upward unit trend.#

Mr. Maxwell is with Lehman Bros. Kuhn Loeb Research.

TM funds Olympics to aid L.A.

Los Angeles—Times Mirror Co. contributed $5 million to become an official sponsor of the 1984 Olympics here, "not because there was any quid pro quo involved," but rather as a way to support the community, a spokesman for the parent of the Los Angeles Times said.

As a sponsor, Times Mirror has the right to use the five-ring Olympic logo, but beyond lapel pins the company has no plans to promote its link to the games in any overt way.

Times Mirror is also an official sponsor of the 10-week "Olympic Arts Festival," a cultural program that will begin a month before the summer games.

As part of the festival, the Royal Opera of Covent Garden will perform in Los Angeles and a major exhibition of impressionist art will be on display at the Los Angeles County Museum of Art. There also will be performances of chamber music, dance and theater included in the event.

Times Mirror will promote the festival with ads placed in its Los Angeles Times Sunday "Home" magazine, as will other companies that have contributed to the games and the festival.#

Looking back on the 'year of acquisitions'

By Jack J. Honomichl

The U.S. marketing/advertising research industry ended 1982—an unsettled year characterized by numerous acquisitions—with a 10.3% increase in revenues over 1981, according to this, the eighth annual review of industry performance compiled exclusively for Advertising Age Magazine.

Jack J. Honomichl writes a regular column on marketing research in the news pages of Advertising Age.

After adjustment for inflation—which was 6.1% in 1982, according to the U.S. Department of Labor's Consumer Price Index-U monthly average—the industry had a "real growth" rate of 4.2%, slightly better than the comparable figure of 3.4% in 1981 and 4.0% in 1980, but still way below the heyday from 1975 to 1978, when real growth exceeded 10% every year.

The top 30 U.S. companies (see following listing) in 1982 had gross worldwide revenues of $1,121,200,000, with 29.7% (or $332.5 million) coming from operations outside the U.S.

As usual, the giant A.C. Nielsen Co., with research revenues of $433.1 million—or 38.6% of the total—dominated the list, and its relatively weak performance in 1982 brought down the total industry's performance. In the years from 1975 to 1981, Nielsen averaged 20% growth per year; in 1982, this fell to 5.2%, mostly because of a drop-off from store audit operations.

Nielsen's performance, itself one of the main findings of this year's analysis, is almost equaled

Top 30 of research

by the profusion of acquisitions that took place; the top 30 companies alone acquired nine other research organizations during the year, furthering the trend toward a concentration of ownership within the U.S. research industry.

To make sure these acquisitions did not unrealistically inflate the industry's growth rate, the revenue increases (or decreases) for individual companies were calculated as follows: Assuming company A bought company B sometime during 1982, the revenues of both companies for all of 1982 were combined for the 1982 listing and then compared with the combined revenues of both in 1981 to produce a rate of change, be it gain or loss. The specifics of these acquisitions and the organizations involved are contained in the 30 individual company profiles.

The total industry figures are influenced greatly by revenues coming from outside the U.S., and most of that is concentrated in the two worldwide conglomerates, A.C. Nielsen and IMS International, that together account for $323.9 million of overseas volume.

If U.S.-only revenues for the top 30 are considered, they collectively had a 14.9% increase in 1982; for overseas revenues alone, it is just slightly less than 1%. Part of this situation—maybe the major part—is the result of a weakening of foreign currencies vis-a-vis the U.S. dollar, which tends to dilute overseas revenues when they are converted into dollars for a consolidated financial statement. Just the opposite was true in previous years, and to the extent it was, the growth of the U.S. research industry—including its overseas revenues—was unrealistically overstated.

Be that as it may, of the 14.9% increase, U.S. revenues only, the lion's share, expressed in dollar volume, can be attributed to three sources: The tv audience measurement services of Arbitron and the Media Research Group of A.C. Nielsen (spurred by the proliferation of meter-based audience measurement systems at the local market level) and the spectacular growth of Information Resources Inc. (IRI), the Chicago-based company that operates the BehaviorScan system in four minimarkets for controlled testing of advertising, merchandising and new product efforts. IRI made more news in early 1983 by floating a public stock issue that could bring in close to $25 million for expansion efforts (with two new markets to be added in 1983).

Of the top 30's collective revenue in 1982, only 20% is attributable to organizations that are privately held; the rest comes from organizations that as of 1982 were either publicly owned or subsidiaries of publicly owned companies.

The profiles of 1982's top 30 companies document their total revenues (which in many cases exceed their research-only revenues), ownership, changes in organization and top management in 1982-1983 and expansion plans for the balance of 1983. For many of the 30, the year 1982 was extraordinary—and collectively, the U.S. industry underwent considerable change.

1 A.C. Nielsen Co., Northbrook, Ill. Public Corporation traded over the counter founded in 1923. Research revenues were $433.1 million, up 5.2% over 1981.

For the 12 months ending Nov. 30, 1982, the world's largest marketing/advertising research organization had gross revenues of $654.2 million. Of that, 66.2% was from research operations in 25 countries. (To put the company's diversification efforts into perspective, research activities accounted for 72.6% of total revenues in 1978, and that percentage has gone down each year since.)

For Nielsen, 1982 was an uncharacteristic down year. The research-only growth rate of 5.2% compares with a yearly average of close to 20% recorded from 1975 to 1981.

Moreover, of the growth in 1982—$21.4 million—78.5% was attributable to the Media Research Group, which specializes in national and local market tv audience measurements.

That left the Marketing Research Group, which specializes in syndicated and custom audits of product movement at retail, with a growth rate of only 1.4%, or $4.96 million.

Put another way, Nielsen's overseas revenues in 1982 (basically syndicated store audit services in 24 countries) were down by nearly $2 million in 1982, while U.S. revenues were up by 13.8%.

Arthur C. Nielsen Jr., chairman and chief executive officer, in an address to shareholders on Feb. 14, noted some recent new developments in the company's research activities:

- A new addition to the corporate headquarters in Northbrook.
- The testing of a so-called "people meter" for possible use in tv audience measurements. This attachment allows the viewer to enter his demographics automatically while viewing a particular channel. "If the test proves successful we would expect to manufacture and install these recorders in homes throughout the U.S.," Mr. Nielsen says.
- A device called NIAT, now used experimentally. It enables field auditors to enter data into a memory, which at night can be transmitted via telephone to Nielsen production center computers.
- An increase in the national tv audience sample from 1,200 to 1,700 meter-equipped households.

President is N. Eugene Harden, 48, a graduate of Lawrence University. Henry Burk, 56, is president of the Marketing Research Group, and James D. Lyons, 47, is president of the Media Research Group. Arthur C. Nielsen Jr., 63, is chairman and ceo.

2 IMS International, New York. Public corporation traded over the counter; founded in 1954. Research revenues were $124.8 million, up 8.3% over 1981.

Of IMS's total revenues ($226.9 million), 55%—or $124.8 million—came from its Market Research Division subsidiaries in 57 countries. (In 1977, 74% of total IMS revenues came from research activities; that percentage has dropped each year since as the result of diversification activities.)

Research revenues in the U.S. (through its subsidiary, IMS America, Ambler, Pa.) were $43.0 million, or 34.5% of the total; that's an increase of 13.2% over 1981.

Overseas research revenues of $81.8 million, in contrast, were up only 5.9% largely because of the strengthening of the U.S. dollar vis-a-vis most foreign currencies; that tended to dilute foreign revenues as they were converted to dollars for the company's consolidated report.

As in years past, IMS continued to obtain almost all its market research business from the pharmaceutical medical and healthcare industry worldwide. Its position in the field is similar to that enjoyed by the A.C. Nielsen in the packaged goods industries. IMS research activities consist mainly of syndicated audits of product movement through panels of doctors, drugstores, hospitals, medical laboratories, nursing homes and others.

Emphasis in recent years has been on the development of online access to IMS data bases via a system called MIDAS.

There are about 2,000 fulltime salaried employes in the Market Research Division of IMS.

Chairman, president and ceo of IMS is Lars H. Ericson, 48.

3 Selling Areas-Marketing Inc., New York. Wholly owned subsidiary of Time Inc; founded in 1966. Research revenues for 1982 were estimated at $85 million, up about 17% over 1981.

The basic activity of SAMI is to amalgamate warehouse withdrawal data to produce continual information on the movement of thousands of individual package goods items sold through food stores. The company monitors 48 marketing areas, three of which were added to the system during 1982: Charleston/Huntington W. Va., Quad Cities, Ill.-Ia. and Wichita, Kan. These 48 SAMI market areas represent about 84.3% of total U.S. all-commodity volume.

SAMI says that revenues of its companion SARDI service were up 36% in 1982 over 1981, and revenues from the Segmentation and SAMSCAN services more than doubled over the year before.

SAMI also reports that extensive modification of its computer software systems is being carried out with an eye towards putting the entire SAMI data base online.

There are 400 fulltime salaried employes located in three U.S. offices.

President of SAMI is Carlyle C. Daniel, 52, a graduate of Lynchburg College.

4 Arbitron Ratings Co., New York. Wholly owned subsidiary of Control Data Corp; founded in 1949. Revenues were $80.3 million, up 20.9% over 1981.

Arbitron's basic business is local market measurements of radio and tv audiences, mostly via mail diaries. In 1982 the company conducted surveys in 256 radio markets (accounting for about $37 million in revenue) and 210 tv markets (accounting for about $43 million). In addition to existing meter-equipped samples in New York, Chicago, Los Angeles and San Francisco, Arbitron opened meter tv measures in the Philadelphia and Dallas "areas of dominant influence" (ADI) early this year. Meter service is slated to be added in Washington, Detroit and Miami ADIs during the year.

In 1982, Arbitron developed U.S. AID, a national database of 5,000 tv diary households for examining nationwide viewing patterns. Also, the company introduced PRIZM/AID, a computer-based system that combines radio and tv audience data with Claritas Corp.'s PRIZM. PRIZM is a system that collects geodemographic life style information at the Zip code level.

During 1983, Arbitron is surveying radio audiences 48 weeks per year, rather than 44. Qualidata 1983, a study of product and media usage by radio listeners in 10 major markets, is scheduled to debut in mid-1983. Arbitron has 811 fulltime employes in seven U.S. offices.

President is Theodore F. Shaker, 61, who also is a vp of Control Data Corp. He attended Colgate, Northwestern and New York Universities.

5 Burke Marketing Services, Cincinnati. Employe-owned corporation; founded in 1947. Research revenues were $52.1 million, up 18.9% over 1981.

The activities of this conglomerate are organized as follows: (1) Test Marketing Group, recently formed by merging AdTel (tv campaign testing in controlled market labs) and Market Audits (retail store audits); (2) BASES, which specializes in market modeling; (3) Burke Marketing Research, which specializes in pre-tv and post-tv copy testing and custom survey research; (4) Professional Services, which conducts research educational seminars; (5) a wholly owned subsidiary, Burke Canada; (6) Burke International, a joint venture with a German company, Infratest, and (7) Telcom Research, a company specializing in physiological measures in reaction to advertising stimuli, which was acquired by Burke in August, 1982.

There are 365 fulltime salaried employes in the Burke organization, which includes 46 office locations—11 for client service staffs, the balance for field data collection activities. About $1.4 million of the company's revenue in 1982 came from outside the U.S.

Chairman is Jack E. Brown, 38, who attended the University of Cincinnati.

6 Market Facts, Chicago. Public company traded over the counter; founded in 1946. Research revenues were $25.4 million, almost the same as in 1981. Of total company revenues of $26.2 million in 1982, about 3% came from nonresearch activities. Also, not included in these volumes are those of a partly owned subsidiary, Market Facts of Canada, which has annual revenues of about $2.4 million.

Market Facts U.S. activities include: (1) The consumer mail panel (135,000 households); (2) Marketest store audit services, seven permanent market setups for controlled store tests and test marketing; (3) five shopping mall facilities; (4) WATS telephone interviewing centers with 90 stations, and (5) focus group facilities. There are 714 fulltime employes (429 of whom are salaried) in 19 office locations, including the national telephone center in Evanston, Ill., and an operations headquarters in Oak Park, Ill.

In late 1982, Market Facts announced a new organization—with a president of the Marketing Research Services Group directing all the company's marketing efforts; a general manager heading all operating and administrative activities (including data collection and processing) and a president of Market Facts Ventures Group, which was formed to design and introduce new products and services.

President and chief operating officer, as of December, 1982, is Verne B. Churchill, 50, who received his MBA from the Indiana University school of business. Chairman and chief executive officer is David K. Hardin, 55, who received his MBA from the University of Chicago.

7 Audits & Surveys, New York. Privately held corporation; founded in 1953. Research revenues for 1982 estimated at $22.5 million.

The A&S organization in the U.S. includes the following business units: Survey division (custom, ad hoc sample surveys); test audit division (local market retail audits); National Total-Market Division (syndicated store audit programs, customized to the product class); Government Research division (survey support for federal agencies); Retail Census of Product Distribution (annual study of U.S. retail store population), and Selling-Areas Distribution Index (distribution checks in food, drug, discount, and variety stores). A separate company, Central Telephone Interviewing System, in the Washington area, offers field and tabulation services via a 125-station computer-assisted telephone interviewing system.

Not included are revenues from other organizations in which A&S or its principals have a financial position: IPSA S.A. A&S Latinamerica, Total-Market Index in Canada, Market Probe International and Integrated Computer Systems, an electronic data processing service bureau.

President of A&S is Richard L. Lysaker, 50, a graduate of the University of Minnesota. Solomon Dutka, 59, founder of A&S is chairman; he received his Ph.D. from Century University in Beverly Hills, Cal.

8 NFO Research, Toledo, O. Wholly owned subsidiary of AGB Research Ltd.; founded in 1946. Revenues in 1982 were $22 million, up 14% over 1981.

In August, 1982, NFO became part of AGB Research Ltd., London, one of the world's largest research organizations.

NFO's 660 employes (of which 384 are fulltime and salaried) are located in eight marketing branch offices and two production facilities—the home office in Toledo (to which a 55,000 sq. ft. addition was added in 1982) and Greensboro, N.C.

NFO's main business is a fixed mail panel, which has been expanded to 220,000 households. Mail purchase panels, operated through NFO's TRAC syndicated research division, offer the following continuing studies: The Share of Intake Panel (consumption of all beverages); men's tailored apparel study; home furnishings tracking service, and two new services added in 1982, women's tailored apparel study and personal home computer and videogame study.

NFO operates two WATS facilities for telephone interviewing, with 160 stations in Toledo and 60 more in Greensboro.

Taking over as president and chief executive officer of NFO in mid-1982 was William E. Lipner, 36. He holds a BA degree in business administration from the University of Toledo.

9 Marketing and Research Counselors, Dallas. Subsidiary of Allcom Inc., a closely held public corporation; founded in 1965. Revenues were $21.9 million, up 21.7% over 1981.

This survey research company, which specializes in automated telephone interviewing, operates six WATS interviewing centers that have a total of 215 stations. About 200 of these are operating on a M/A/R/C-developed Automatic Custom Research System (ACRS), a state-of-the-art computerized system that integrates interviewing with tabulating and is supported by a software library of 47 programs. Outsiders can lease the ACRS system.

During 1982, M/A/R/C sold five shopping center mall data collection facilities.

Also in 1982, the company introduced a new service called the National Neighborhood Panel, which contains 26,000 Zip code-clustered households in 22 geographic areas. These panel households are available for telephone, mail or face-to-face interviewing.

By 1984, says M/A/R/C, the panel will be expanded to 100,000 participating households in 25 markets.

M/A/R/C has 194 fulltime salaried employes, plus more than 200 hourly staff professionals, in nine U.S. offices.

President is Cecil B. (Bud) Phillips, 58, a graduate of Southern Methodist University.

10 NPD Group, Port Washington, N.Y. A group of privately held corporations under common ownership; founded in 1967. Research revenues were $21.5 million, up 20.1% over 1981.

Listed as NPD Research last year, this company has since undergone a reorganization, changed its name and consoli-or unconscious—by those in line management.

2. Consumer research budgets must be established independently of the wit or whimsy of operating managers with, necessarily, short term objectives.

3. The effectiveness of the consumer research function must be appraised against explicit and objective criteria, and its continued support based upon that appraisal. It must, in short, justify its costly existence.

4. Consumer research must be the business of those who toil only in its vineyards. It is not the proper business of advertising agencies, design companies, public relations organizations, corporate image makers, counselors, or others—however gifted their personnel and exemplary their motives—whose essential business is something else.

There are, of course, any number of ways to get there, "there" being the sort of structure in which such ground rules are embraced and in which consumer research can flourish. Good organizational arrangements, like good clothing, are tailored to the idiosyncratic contours of those who wear them. In each case, where "one size fits all," it does so badly.

One mechanism for doing, however—one way of establishing precisely the desired organizational environment—is to assign the consumer research function, in its entirety or in large part, to an independent research company, and, in so doing, ennoble it with that stature and recognition conferred upon the advertising agency, or outside legal counsel, or the public relations consultant.

Plainly, that is only one way. Moreover, it represents an evidently iconoclastic solution (though it is not new), one that seems heretical and is, in some respects, frightening. It entrusts to an "outsider" information that is both sensitive and confidential. It induces in line management that most formidable of all anxieties—the fear of loss of control. It raises all of the specters associated with a sole supplier—among them ripoff, sloth and unhealthy coziness. It implies the existence within one shop of all of the accrued knowledge about consumer research.

All that it has going for it is that it works astonishingly well.

TRACE
the latest word
in copy research

MarketVision's TRACE™ copy testing system combines the vital audience measurements of recall and persuasion into one highly effective and cost efficient research system.

TRACE enters cable TV homes via pre-edited pilot program tapes that assure constant control of critical program, clutter, and position variables, while avoiding media charges and "cut-in" expenses. TRACE day-after-recall interviews are then conducted from MarketVision's national WATS center which eliminates local interviewer differences and offers the ultimate in quality control.

The standard $5,500 TRACE test cost is an exceptional value for an in-home normal viewing environment test of the highest quality available.

11 Maritz Market Research, Fenton, Mo. Wholly owned subsidiary of Maritz Inc.; founded in 1973. Research revenues were $18.5 million, down 2.1% from 1981.

During 1982, MMRI made news—and broadened its business base—with the acquisition of three survey research companies: Quatra Marketing Research in Minneapolis, Houlahan/Parker Marketing Research in Los Angeles and Clare Brown Associates, Garwood, N.J.

Churchill, Market Facts

Lysacker, A&S

Lipner, NFO

Phillips, M/A/R/C

Brenner, NPD Group

The largest unit within MMRI is Quality Controlled Services, which—with 16 field offices—is believed to be the largest central location network in the U.S. It is estimated that this unit accounts for about 40% of Maritz revenues.

In addition to its headquarters in Fenton, Mo., which is near St. Louis, Maritz' staff performs custom and syndicated surveys through divisional offices in Detroit and Toledo. There are three WATS telephone survey facilities. In total, the company has 186 fulltime salaried employes.

President is Paul E. Barnard, 53, a graduate of the University of Missouri. He reports to William H. Lewellen, group executive of the Maritz Research Services Group.

12 Westat Inc., Rockville, Md. An employe-owned corporation; founded in 1961. Revenues were $17.3 million, up 8.8% over 1981.

This survey research company, with 195 fulltime salaried employes, does more than 90% of its work for agencies of the federal government. A new divison, Marketstat, was created in late 1982 to expand the commercial business, concentrating on telephone-based studies.

Revenues come from a full range of survey research methodologies—personal, face to face, mail and telephone interviewing, which includes a staff of about 325 phone interviewers and computer-assisted telephone interviewing capabilities.

President and chief executive officer is Joseph A. Hunt, 47, who has an MS degree from Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Edward C. Bryant, the founder of Westat, is chairman.

13 Elrick & Lavidge, Chicago. Wholly owned subsidiary of Equifax; founded in 1951. Research revenues were $16.9 million in 1982, up [illegible].8% over 1981.

E&L, a research company specializing in both consumer and business-to-business surveys, moved up in this year's ranking because of the acquisition in late 1982 of Quick Test, Cornwells Heights, Pa.

Quick Test, with 11 shopping mall sites, is one of the largest central location operations in the U.S.; it added about $5.8 million to E&L's volume. Subsequently, the 11 QT sites were merged in with four already operated by E&L to form a new, independent business unit, Quick Test Opinion Centers. Currently, microprocessors for interviewing are being installed in eight of the new unit's sites, which will make possible computer-controlled interviewing in several sites through one organization with common software and hardware.

Also, E&L recently announced a new syndicated service called Multo-Call, which is based on face-to-face interviews in malls, with clients buying in on a question-by-question basis.

President is Gerald Lukeman, 51, who is a graduate of Dartmouth College. Pierre Marquis, 56, a graduate of Boston University School of Law, is chairman.

15 Chilton Research Services—Radnor, Pa Wholly owned subsidiary of American Broadcasting Co.; founded in 1957. Research revenues were $16.2 million, up 6.6% over 1981.

This custom survey research company has 158 fulltime, salaried employes in two offices.

Chilton maintains one of the largest computer-assisted telephone interviewing installations in the U.S.—125 stations, excluding two banks used only for continuous American Telephone & Telegraph studies.

New director of CRS is Gilbert Barrish, 43, a graduate of Temple University with a BS in economics.

16 Yankelovich, Skelly & White, New York. Wholly owned subsidiary of Reliance Group; founded in 1958. Revenues were $13.4 million, up 3.9% over 1981.

This survey research company does marketing and social research for industry, governmental agencies and media—most notably Time and Fortune. About 5% of its volume is from outside the U.S.

Two of the company's most widely used services are Monitor, tracking surveys of special social segments, and Laboratory Test Market, a market simulation facility widely used by package goods manufacturers for new product appraisals. In mid-1982, the company started to reorganize its basic survey activities (and staff) along client categories: Consumer Marketing Group, New Products Group, Policy Planning Group and Human Resources Group. In 1983, two new groups are planned, one in the area of government and the other in industrial marketing.

Also, YS&W is committed to integrating hands-on consulting capabilities into each group as a separate service area. Towards that end, the company in early 1983 announced the acquisition of McBer & Co., a Boston-based consulting company specializing in human resources.

There are about 150 fulltime, salaried employes at YS&W.

Founder and chairman is Daniel Yankelovich, 58, a graduate of Harvard University. President is Florence Skelly, a graduate of Hunter College.

in the right locations

At Elrick & Lavidge, our people have the marketing experience and know-how you need to plan, implement, and analyze a research project. But even the best people are only as good as the in-field interviewers, facilities, and locations they have access to. That's why we've developed our own network of research facilities in more than 20 locations to provide you with the best facilities and field staff possible.

Elrick & Lavidge facilities include mall interviewing centers, computer-assisted telephone interviewing, a center for nationwide local telephone centers, focus group facilities, and more (see chart). Our staff of over 500 full and part-time employees, assures you of uniformly trained and supervised interviewers, even when a project involves many locations.

These extensive resources, both people and facilities, mean we can handle all, or any part of your research project, depending on your needs. And one Elrick & Lavidge representative coordinates everything, from start to finish.

1964. Research revenues were $12.6 million, up 7.8% over 1981.

This survey research company, which has 201 fulltime employes (80 of whom are salaried), is descended from a local field service organization, Walker Research Service, founded in 1939 by Mrs. Tommie Walker Anderson.

Walker now has five divisions. The operations division manages a network of branch data collection offices in eight cities, as well as its interactive computer and its data-processing system.

This network provides a variety of interviewing services, including mall intercepts, prerecruited focus groups, local and national WATS interviewing via cathode ray tubes. In addition Walker is currently operating more than 200 phone interviewing stations.

A special service division develops and administers contractual and continuous measurement research programs, and two account service divisions (East and West) are responsible for custom study design, analysis and interpretive services. Finally, there is a corporate service division.

President and ceo is Frank D. Walker, 48, a graduate of DePauw University.

18 Information Resources Inc., Chicago. Privately held corporation; founded in 1977. Revenues were $12.3 million, up 109.5% over 1981.

The main business of this fast-growing company—which this March offered a block of its common stock for public subscription—is the BehaviorScan system, a group of four minimarkets that are set up for controlled store testing. In each market, BehaviorScan can (1) capture product movement data in retail stores with universal product code scanners; (2) alternate tv advertising over cable tv to groups of selected households; (3) collect purchase data from a panel of about 2,500 households through the use of supermarket point-of-sale UPC scanners, and (4) collect other measures of instore merchandising and promotions. Two new markets were added to the BehaviorScan system in early 1983.

The other major IRI service, called the Marketing Fact Book, makes available access to a database of purchasing activity on a large number of package goods product classes. Starting this year, clients will be offered access to this database on an online, interactive basis.

IRI has 224 fulltime, salaried employes.

President and chief operating officer is Gian Fulgoni, 35, who has a master's degree from Manchester University in England. Chairman and ceo is John Malec, 38, a graduate of the University of Wisconsin.

19 Louis Harris & Associates, New York. Wholly owned subsidiary of Gannett Co.; founded in 1956. Research revenues were $12.1 million, up 19.8% over 1981.

About 31% of the company's volume comes from foreign subsidiaries, Louis Harris International in London and Louis Harris France in Paris. The rest —$8.4 million—comes from U.S. operations, an increase of 26.5% over the comparable number for 1981. These domestic volumes include two subsidiaries: The National Center for Telephone Research in New York and Louis Harris & Associates in Washington. The company has a total of 130 fulltime, salaried employes.

The company is organized into 13 divisions, each specializing in survey research for different markets, among them public affairs, healthcare and banking. It also fields multiclient surveys to track corporate, financial, public and leadership opinions on key issues.

Chairman and ceo is the company's founder, Louis Harris, 62, the well-known syndicated newspaper columnist (178 newspapers); he is a graduate of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. President and chief operating officer is Humphrey Taylor, 48, a graduate of Cambridge University in England.

The E-B Group includes Ehrhart-Babic Associates, which specializes in custom store audits, controlled store tests and minimarkets tests, and National Retail Tracking Index, a unit that does syndicated observational store stocking checks in various classes of the retail trade—supermarkets, garden stores and hardware stores, for instance. During 1982, the index's national liquor, wine and beer panel was supplemented with 2,885, on-premise accounts (restaurants, cocktail lounges, hotels and bars) in the top 36 markets.

Not included in E-B revenues is Ehrhart-Babic Data Services, an electronic data processing service bureau.

E-B Group has 111 fulltime salaried employes.

21 Data Development Corp., New York, Privately held corporation; founded in 1960. Revenues were $11.8 million, up 5.4% over 1981.

Revenues include all units: Data Development, Central Location Testing, New York Conference Center and Telephone Centre, a 40-station interviewing facility partially equipped with cathode ray tubes.

All told, there are 120 fulltime, salaried employes in four office locations.

In 1983, DDC plans to open a West Coast office and set up a second conference center facility, in Chicago.

DDC is jointly managed by chairman Jerry Rosenkranz and president Joseph Goldstein. Both are 47 years old and graduates of the City University of New York.

22 Winona Research, Minneapolis. Privately held corporation; founded in 1953. Revenues were $11.3 million, up 11.[illegible]% over 1981.

This survey research company, with 150 fulltime salaried employes in three offices (plus two mall operations), includes a WATS and computer assisted telephone interviewing facility with 160 stations, 110 of which are cathode ray tube-equipped, in Phoenix (through the acquisition of Research Information Center from Greyhound Corp. in March, 1982).

President is Richard McCullough, 39, a graduate of the University of Minnesota.

23 Opinion Research Corp., Princeton, N.J. Wholly owned subsidiary of Arthur D. Little Inc.; founded in 1938. Revenues were $10.2 million, up 24.4% over 1981.

ORC, which has 151 fulltime salaried employes, maintains four branch sales/service offices in the following cities: Chicago, New York, San Francisco and Washington.

In addition to custom ad hoc studies for agencies of the federal government and industry, ORC does numerous shared-cost surveys periodically, such as the Investment Community Survey; the Public Opinion Index (opinions of target groups, such as business executives or Washington thought leaders); Corporate Reputation Survey; Marketing Index, which tracks trends and issues; Travel Pulse, a study of the travel market, and Caravan surveys, a pioneer of shared-cost surveys.

Twenty Years of Data Collection in Denver

Colorado Market Research first opened its doors two decades ago. Since 1962 Denver has grown to the tune of 50,000 new residents each year and developed into the hub of the Western energy and recreational boom. We've been growing right along with it.

Colorado Market Research locally pioneered the use of permanent mall locations, focus group facilities, test kitchens, modern interviewing techniques and centralized telephone banks. And soon we'll offer computer-assisted mall and telephone interviewing.

Colorado Market Research Specializes in Denver

Colorado Market Research is Denver owned, Denver based and Denver staffed. We don't have offices spread across the country; we've spread them across our city. And we know Denver like no one else.

Experienced, innovative, comprehensive and knowledgeable. Add it all up and you'll know to get in touch with Denver, get in touch with Colorado Market Research.

24 Harte-Hanks Marketing Services Group, Fair Lawn, N.J. Subsidiary of Harte-Hanks Communications, a public company traded on the New York Stock Exchange; the Marketing Services Group was founded in 1975. Revenues were $9.6 million, up 2.8% over 1981.

This research conglomerate, put together by Harte-Hanks Communications, a large publishing company based in San Antonio, grew significantly in 1982 because of two acquisitions: TeleResearch (tv copy testing), Westport, Conn., and TRIM (controlled store tests using UPC scanner databases), Los Angeles.

The other business units are RMH Research, a full-service survey company specializing in communications research, Fair Lawn, N.J.; National WATS Services, a telephone interviewing facility with 65 stations, also in Fair Lawn, and Urban Data Processing, an electronic data processing service bureau specializing in custom processing of U.S. Census data for marketing applications, Burlington, Mass.

In total, the Marketing Service Group has 125 fulltime salaried employes.

President of the Marketing Services Group is Richard Hochhauser, 38, the founder of RMH Research and a vp at Harte-Hanks Communications. He received his MBA degree from Columbia University.

25 Decisions Center, New York. Privately held corporation; founded in 1965. Revenues were $8.4 million, up 21.7% over 1981.

Decisions Center, which has 97 fulltime salaried employees, is organized by the following divisions: Decisions Center, Qualitative Decisions Center, DCI International, Murray Hill Center (a focus group facility) and Facts Center, a 63-station WATS telephone interviewing facility. In early 1983, the company opened a branch office in Rochester, N.Y.

The company specializes in survey research—concept and product tests, copy research, tracking and trade studies and large-scale market and strategy studies.

It is managed by chairman Bernard Ruderman, 51, who has an MS from Pennsylvania State University, and Bernard Levine, 57, who has an MBA from New York University.

26 McCollum/Spielman/ & Co. Great Neck, N.Y. Privately held corporation; founded in 1968. Research revenues were $7.1 million, up 16.4% over 1981.

In October, 1982, M/S/C/ acquired Hyatt/Esserman and Child Research Services, an operation now called McCollum/Spielman Associates. Together, these organizations have 69 fulltime, salaried employes.

M/S/C's basic business is the pretesting of tv commercials, print ads and radio commercials. The main service is called AC-T (Advertising Control for Television), which uses controlled theater settings in 12 locations around the U.S. to measure attitude changes in relation to tv commercial exposure.

The new associates group focuses on survey research and recently announced two syndicated services.

Chief executive officer is Harold M. Spielman, 56, who received his BBS degree in sociology from City University of New York.

NIELSEN

ADDING NEW DIMENSIONS

Nielsen Marketing Research provides the consumer goods marketer with comprehensive information on his own brands as well as those of his competitors. The breadth and depth of the Nielsen data package in an action-oriented on-line environment is incomparable. Still, marketers are seeking new research dimensions to help them make better decisions. As a result of technological advances, many of these new dimensions are taking form at Nielsen today.

Weekly Scanning Information
One such development is weekly scanning information that provides new dimensions of detail and frequency. Nielsen scanning services permit analyses of discrete time frames for insight into weekly pricing and promotional activity and the effect on consumer sales. Data are available on both a local market and national basis.

Nielsen... bringing new dimensions to marketing research.

Revenues were $7.0 million, up 10.1% over 1981.

Company 1982 revenues, which include two wholly owned subsidiaries, Roper Organization in New York and Starch INRA Hooper Canada, also included $1.4 million from outside the U.S.

Domestic revenues alone were up 14.9% over 1981.

This survey company, best known for print ad and print media audience measures, launched two new syndicated services in 1982: FARMS (for Farm Audience Readership Measurement Service) for the agrimarketing industry and Starch Cable Services (SCS), specializing in tv cable audience measurements. (SCS data will be marketed through the Fenger Co.)

President and ceo is William J. (Jay) Wilson, 46, a graduate of Yale University.

28 Market Opinion Research, Detroit. Privately held corporation, founded in 1941. Research revenues were $6.7 million, up 43.4% over 1982.

Total revenues in 1982 were $7.4 million, of which 89% (or $6.7 million) was attributable to five research divisions: consumer and industrial, media, social, information systems and political.

Much of the increase in revenues in 1982 was because of political campaigns; the company's political division is a mainstay with Republican candidates, and in 1982 it worked for 33 statewide candidates and 63 congressional races.

The 260 employes (90 of whom are fulltime and salaried) are in three U.S. offices and one in Toronto, Canada.

During 1982, the company established a Healthcare Marketing Department to assist hospitals and healthcare agencies in planning and launched a new Geographical Targeting System, which combines census data with client survey data to facilitate small-geography target marketing.

Chairman and chief executive officer is Frederick P. Currier, 59, who received his MA from the University of Illinois.

The president is Robert M. Teeter, 44, who received his MA from Michigan State University.

29 National Analysts, Philadelphia. A division of Booz Allen & Hamilton; founded in 1943. Revenues were $6.6 million, down 1% from 1981.

This venerable organization specializes in custom survey research and strategic marketing consulting for commercial organizations and government agencies.

Professional staff specialists focus on (1) financial surveys, (2) telecommunications, (3) the information industry, (4) pharmaceuticals and medical equipment, (5) automotive, (6) package goods and (7) litigation support.

There are 73 fulltime salaried employes in Philadelphia and New York.

In 1982, the company launched two shared-cost industry studies—in the field of home information systems and transaction volumes of non-credit services for banks.

President is Marshall G. Greenberg, 47, who holds a Ph.D. in mathematical psychology from the University of Michigan.

30 Custom Research, Minneapolis. Privately held corporation; founded in 1974. Revenues were $6.4 million, up 36.2% over 1981.

This custom survey research company is now organized into five divisions: Consumer research, business to business, eastern office (a branch located in Union, N.J.), corporate services and custom research telephone, a central telephone, cathode ray tube-equipped WATS interviewing facility with 40 stations.

There are 75 fulltime, salaried employes.

The company is managed by two partners: Jeffrey L. Pope, 42, received his MBA from the Kellogg School of Management, Northwestern University; and Judith S. Corson, 40, a graduate of the University of Minnesota.

Here are seven that came close

The cutoff at 30 for 1982's largest U.S. research companies is arbitrary, and it leaves the question, What would the list look like if more companies were included?

The exact answer isn't known, but here are seven companies that most likely would be included in an expanded listing (in alphabetical order):

AHF Marketing Research, New York. A privately held survey research company.

Burgoyne Inc., Cincinnati. Privately held company specializing in store audits, controlled store tests, distribution checks.

Decision/Making/Information, Santa Ana, Cal. Privately held custom survey research company.

Market Research Corp. of America, Stamford, Conn. Specialists in mail-diary purchase panels and studies of food consumption in-home. A privately held corporation.

Mediamark Research Inc., New York. Owned by principals and the British company, Mills & Allen International PLC. Operates a syndicted media/product research service.

Response Analysis, Princeton, N.J. Privately held custom survey research company.

Simmons Market Research Bureau, New York. Partly owned subsidiary of JWT Group. Specializes in syndicated service relating media consumption with product usage. —J.H.

BURKE INTRODUCES THE ULTIMATE CONCEPT IN TELEVISION COMMERCIAL TESTING... Selector✓

For years, the Burke Day-After Recall technique has been recognized as the industry standard for evaluating television commercial effectiveness… for very good reasons. But we never stopped looking for ways to make television commercial testing better.

Now there's Burke SELECTOR.

At Burke, we have been measuring the recall effectiveness of television commercials for a long time, knowing full well that commercial recall is only part of the advertising effectiveness equation. While attention and memorability are very important first steps in successful communication, the bottom line of every commercial's success or failure is sales effectiveness. Validly measuring sales effectiveness, however, is no easy task. Other systems have tried to accomplish this, but have failed to provide the industry with convincing evidence that they are indeed measuring sales effect. At Burke, however, we have a unique opportunity. Adtel, another Burke company, provides us with a means for providing the kind of copy test validation the industry has been asking for. And we intend to do just that! That's why we developed SELECTOR.

Burke SELECTOR is a system that combines both a recall and persuasion measurement of a commercial's effectiveness with exposure taking place on-air and in the home.

The system utilizes a recruited-audience for greater control, easier set-up, no cut-ins or cut-in charges, and consistent samples that include working women. Best of all, the cost of a SELECTOR test is about half the total cost of a conventional on-air day-after recall test.

So make the move to SELECTOR. The complete copy testing system the industry has been waiting for.

Contact your Burke representative for more information about SELECTOR and our Adtel validation proposal.

Burke…still the first name in television commercial testing.

The Bait

Prominently displayed in a "best food day" edition of the Chicago Tribune was this advertisement for Essent shampoo, a nonexistent product. It is the bait in the latest "sting" operation to trap those who engage in fraudulent coupon redemption. Blair Marketing placed the ad.

New coupon trap set

By NANCY GIGES

A major coupon fraud "sting" operation, described by one insider as the most ambitious yet, is under way in New York and Chicago.

The current operation is at least the third such one in recent years. But unlike previous ones, which caught mostly small "mom and pop" violators, the latest effort is aimed at unspecified "big operators," sources said.

The current sting also differs from previous ones in that the U.S. Postal Service apparently isn't involved. The operation seems to be spearheaded by a private industrial-security association and seems to involve only local government authorities. Participants in the operation either refused to discuss it on the record or would not return phone calls.

It's believed that officials plan to use straight theft grounds in local jurisdictions as the basis for charges stemming from fraudulent coupon redemption. Previously, the USPS and the Federal Bureau of Investigation worked under federal statutes against interstate transportation of stolen property and mail fraud.

Some sources close to the investigation said it also will include a followup fictitious marketing survey of retailers suspected of misredemption. This "survey" would attempt to obtain unwitting admissions from retailers that they committed fraud because they attempted to redeem coupons for a product that

Industry losing $350 million on coupon misredemption

By JENNIFER ALTER and NANCY GIGES

Coupon fraud is the problem that simply will not go away. While officials involved say that indictments and convictions are increasing, they also acknowledge that the occasional successful sting operation and other investigations probably haven't significantly reduced the over-all rate of coupon misredemption.

That rate is commonly put at an alarmingly high 20%. What that means, given the rapid rise in coupon use by manufacturers in recent years, is that, if anything, the actual number and value of coupons fraudulently redeemed each year are higher than ever. Last year, the dollar value of misredeemed coupons was about $350 million, according to recent estimates.

Manufacturers, U.S. authorities and clearinghouse executives increasingly believe the bulk of money is lost through organized use of people who buy newspapers in lots, cut out coupons "gang" style and possibly even reproduce them. As a consequence, investigators have been shifting their focus to the bigger operators, including—possibly—organized crime.

The U.S. Postal Service currently is running 42 cou-

Miles Labs moves One-A-Day to TLK from JWT

Elkhart, Ind.—Miles Laboratories' consumer healthcare division has moved the One-A-Day vitamin line to Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago, from J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. Miles spent about $10.8 million in measured media on the brand in 1982. The company would not confirm the move, part of a formal agency review (AA, May 23).

Gillette cleared in Mennen infringement suit

New York—A New York federal district court judge cleared Gillette on all counts following a trial involving a suit filed by Mennen Co. in March. Mennen had claimed that Gillette's relaunch and repackaging of its Right Guard deodorant/antiperspirant (AA, March 7, et seq.) constituted a trademark infringement on Mennen's packaging stripes. It also contended that Right Guard's packaging was deceptive. The court also ruled in favor of Gillette for costs and attorney's fees.

Net affiliates balk at Alberto spots

By DIANE MERMIGAS

Los Angeles—Alberto-Culver Co. is encountering some resistance to its experimental, nonintegrated national 30-second spots from CBS affiliates and independent tv stations.

Some CBS affiliates, meeting at their annual convention here, expressed concern that commercial clutter will contribute to viewer defections.

At least four CBS stations on May 23 substituted either a network promotion or a public service announcement for the nonintegrated spot for Alberto hairspray and the company's SugarTwin product. Other affiliates were expected to follow suit with subsequent telecasts of the spot.

CBS several weeks ago decided to allow Alberto to present joined 15-second spots for unrelated products within a regular 30-second unit, with strict restrictions. CBS has accepted 12 "shared-30" spots from Alberto, a number of which feature unrelated products. These nonintegrated spots are expected to begin airing soon.

Alberto group vp James Witherell acknowledges that some stations are "balking and dragging their feet. We expect there to be a transition period while people are adjusting to this new idea." He said representatives from the company, its agencies and its media-buying service are meeting with reluctant CBS and ABC affiliates and with independents. "It's just a matter of education," he says.

Mondale talks with GSD&M

By TOM BAYER

Former U.S. Vice-President Walter Mondale is negotiating with Roy Spence, senior vp of Austin, Tex.-based ad agency GSD&M, to handle the Democratic presidential hopeful's 1984 campaign advertising.

GSD&M would create an '84 election group as a wholly owned subsidiary, operating out of Austin and Washington. Sources estimate media spending could reach $20 million—doubling the agency's billings—if Mr. Mondale's campaign extends through the general election.

Mr. Spence's political advertising record includes handling Texas Gov. Mark White, who handily defeated Republican former Gov. William Clements.#

RJR puts Century's into 225-unit carton

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

Claiming that it was merely coincidence, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco chose the Brooklyn Bridge's 100th anniversary day last week to disclose the arrival of Century, a cigaret in cartons of 225 units that will sell for the same price as a 200-smoke carton.

James Johnston, exec vp of RJR Tobacco, said that the company will be able to sell the new brand, with nine 25-unit packs per carton, at prices comparable to cartons containing ten 20-unit cigaret packs through "advertising and packaging [cost] efficiencies." In

NBC scores big gains, May sweeps end in tie

By DIANE MERMIGAS

In the closest sweeps ratings races ever, the three networks virtually tied in May, each averaging about a 15 rating, 25 share in prime time.

A.C. Nielsen Co., whose sweeps period lasted from April 28 to May 25, showed CBS with a slight edge, averaging a 15.2/25.7 to NBC's 14.9/25.3 and ABC's 14.7/25.1. Final averages from Arbitron Ratings Co. for April 27 to May 24 show CBS with a 15.1/25.5, NBC with a 15.0/25.4 and ABC with a 14.9/25.3.

Combined figures of the two services show CBS the leader with a 15.1/25.5, with NBC and ABC tied at 14.9/25.2. The figures represent a 2% to 3% improvement for CBS (depending on the ratings service), a 7% improvement for NBC and a 2% to 3% decline for ABC compared with May, 1982.

The closeness of the three networks primarily was the result of NBC's first-run blockbuster specials performing well against what frequently were regular series reruns on the other two networks.

NBC's strong showing expanded the networks' combined rating to 45, up 2% over last May's combined numbers in both services, and helped boost the networks' combined households to 37.4 million, up 5% over May, 1982. Hut levels (homes using television) were up 4% over last May to 59.

Industry observers differed on whether the May race was not indicative of the competition that might occur in prime time next season. Some said NBC demonstrated its ability to program specials effectively to compensate for its lack of series strength.

"By next November everyone will have original series episodes, and all three networks will be in a very strong position to counterprogram each other with specials," said Dave Poltrack, vp-research, CBS/Broadcast Group. Specials that helped make NBC competitive were the May 23 birthday special for Bob Hope, which garnered a 23.9/38; a 25-year retrospective of "Motown," which ranked as the top-rated show for the week ending May 23 with a 22.8/35, and the miniseries "V," which aired earlier in May.

An analysis of night-by-night figures shows NBC drew some viewers for its specials from ABC's regular series audience and from regular patrons of alternative media such as cable tv.

New season same old story

By CRAIG REISS

New York—The new fall network tv prime time schedules unveiled earlier this month will produce virtually no change in the ratings battle. CBS will emerge as the early ratings leader and NBC will remain in third place, unable to close the gap between it and ABC.

Those are the major conclusions to be drawn from an Advertising Age survey of the way buyers at top ad agencies are projecting shares for this year's fourth-quarter network prime time battles.

On average, the agencies predict that by the end of December, CBS will have an average household share of 27.5, with ABC second at 26.3 and NBC lagging behind at Saatchi's now after McCall?

By FRED DANZIG

New York—Is one of America's agency plums ripe for picking by Britain's Saatchi brothers?

Reports circulated here late last week that McCaffrey & McCall, one of the more assiduously pursued closely held agencies, was holding talks with Maurice and Charles Saatchi of Saatchi & Saatchi.

A spokesman in London said he could neither confirm nor deny that negotiations are under way. "We are engaged in conversation with agencies all over the world all the time," he said. Neither Maurice nor Charles Saatchi was available for comment.

Asked about the reports of an imminent acquisition announcement, David McCall, chairman-creative director, managed to dance around the subject as he spoke of his long-standing admiration of the Saatchis and of their admiration of his agency.

"It [the report] would have been true at any time in the last five years," he said, explaining, "We are and we remain very good friends."

Mr. McCall said the ongoing friendship "would certainly ac-

CBS' results ease affiliate unrest

By DIANE MERMIGAS

Los Angeles—The annual CBS-TV affiliates meeting here last week was a love fest void of pressing issues, with the network demonstrating how it made good on "promise and performance" in nearly every daypart last season.

Underlying affiliate concerns on such subjects as nonintegrated 30-second spots, the network's sales and profit picture and counterprograming moves were not always addressed directly by CBS top brass.

The "promise and performance" theme was coined by Tony Malara, president of CBS Television Network, and set the tone for the three-day event.

"I think the affiliates are generally happy. There's not much to be unhappy about when you look at the changes and problems at the other networks," said Guy Main, chairman of the CBS affiliates board and exec vp of Midwest Television, Champaign, Ill.

In group sessions, network executives glossed over their recent decision to permit experimental nonintegrated 30-second spots with stringent restrictions, which some affiliates are refusing to air.

James Rosenfield, exec vp, CBS/Broadcast Group, squelched affiliate concerns about a possible third-phase expansion of prime time ad inventory by declaring the network will take no such action this fall.

The problem of the network's current soft ad sales picture and declining profitability was not addressed directly by CBS executives.

Thomas Wyman, in his first address to affiliates as chairman and recent successor to William Paley, assured station executives that "despite a softness in the scatter market, the picture in broadcasting is brighter than it has been for quite some time."

"Our marketplace analysis and timing were mostly right, and the theory worked better than we thought it would," Jerry Dominus, vp-sales for CBS Television Network, told the group.

Although he conceded "the strong economy that had been expected just hasn't materialized," he reported increased sales in Saturday morning children's, sports and news programing. He also predicted automotive sales, the network's biggest category, "will be up significantly."

Local ad sales are projected to increase as much as 13% this year, and national spot sales will be up about 12.5%, he said.

The network will maintain its current sales and business strategy into 1984, when management expects to see an over-all revenue increase of 12% over this year, Gene Jankowski said in an interview with Advertising Age. The president of CBS/Broadcast Group also told affiliates in a closed session the network's recent hiring freeze and current cost-cutting would not affect program development or production. He said he hoped natural attrition would reduce the company's staff by about 400 persons by year's end.

He said he will be relying on the recommendations of division heads, expected to be delivered within the next two weeks, in deciding how other costs will be cut the rest of this year and into 1984.

Some affiliates felt trepidation at the announcement by Scott Michels, vp-affiliate relations, that CBS' eventual conversion to satellite program distribution will cost the stations the same if not more than they now pay for conventional landlines transmission.

"There will be a studied challenge on the satellite distribution costs after the network presents us with all the details of their plan at a June 10 meeting," said Jim Babb, former CBS affiliates board chairman and exec vp of Jefferson Pilot Broadcasting, Charlotte, N.C.

The satellite distribution plan, which CBS will begin experimenting with in nine Southwest cities this summer, will require stations to purchase receiving dishes. More than 100 CBS affiliates that already have invested heavily in receiving dishes for their own use were told they probably could use them as a backup.

Other issues such as affiliate encouragement of the network to pursue source licensing of music, Federal Communications Commission requirement that cable operators carry network teletext services and repeal of the syndication and financial-interest rules were matters on which broadcasters on both sides of the fence were agreed.

In many instances, CBS brass headed off affiliate concerns early by announcing such things as the implementation this fall of shared network-station on-air identifications and unprecedented co-op promo opportunities for affiliates.

Neal Pilson, president of CBS Sports, reassured affiliates the network will carry at least four already scheduled National Collegiate Athletic Assn. football games this fall despite the outcome of litigation regarding game scheduling.

Regarding the highly publicized libel suit pending against the network's "60 Minutes," CBS News president Van Gordon Sauter said, " '60 Minutes' has never lost a libel suit nor has it settled out of court. We expect to win this suit."

The sheer volume of special programing that CBS has lined up for the 1983-84 season (including 32 hours of miniseries, more than 45 hours of made-for-tv movies and 20 hours of theatrical films) indicates the top-ranked network will accelerate its counterprograming tactics during sweep months and against such blockbuster events as ABC's telecast of the Winter and Summer Olympics. But the only major scheduling decisions the network has revealed so far are plans to air the original "Star Wars" during the February, 1984, sweeps.

B. Donald Grant, CBS Entertainment president, defended the network's "bold and aggressive" move to go with three regularly scheduled movie nights next fall, in response to what he said was erroneous conjecture by some ad agencies that CBS' series pilot development was weak or that the network has chosen to play it safe.

"Rather than watch good half-hour series become the early casualties of the programing wars, forcing us to add a third movie night, we now are starting with a third night—taking advantage of a movie inventory that is truly unprecedented," Mr. Grant said.#

Times Mirror, 'Post' consider videotex

Los Angeles—Times Mirror Co. has made an agreement with the Washington Post to consider the possibility of offering a commercial videotex service in the Washington-Baltimore area.

The Post becomes the latest newspaper to associate with Videotex America, a partnership between Times Mirror Videotex Services and Infomart of Canada, to pursue electronic publishing. Other newspapers include the Arizona Republic/Phoenix Gazette, Florida Times-Union/Jacksonville Journal, Minneapolis Star & Tribune, San Francisco Chronicle and the McClatchy newspapers based in Sacramento.

Otis Chandler, Times Mirror chairman and editor-in-chief, made the announcement at the company's annual shareholders meeting here last week—a meeting in which company officials made optimistic predictions about 1983, as compared with Times Mirror's sluggish 1982 performance.

President-chief executive officer Robert Erburu predicted, "barring unforeseen circumstances," the media giant will have a record year in 1983, with gains expected in the newspaper and tv operations. But, he cautioned, the "final measure of our actual performance will depend most upon the timing of the economic recovery and upon the magnitude of the losses incurred by our affiliate cable systems."

So far in 1983, Times Mirror's cable operations have shown operating gains over last year's levels, but continue to incur sizable losses in several joint-venture systems. This will affect the company's earnings for the balance of the year, Mr. Erburu said.

At Times Mirror's newspaper group, the outlook is cautiously optimistic. In the first quarter of '83, operating profit increased to almost $40 million from last year's $31 million, due to a decline in newsprint prices and the strict cost-control programs the company has had in place since early 1982.

Growth in daily and Sunday circulation has helped boost revenues, Mr. Erburu said. Ad rate increases at Times Mirror newspapers also have resulted in higher revenues, he said, although he conceded that the outlook for ad linage improvements will depend upon the economy.

Full-run advertising for all Times Mirror newspapers was off 4.7% in the first quarter; at the Los Angeles Times, it was off 8.6%.#

episodes during the sweeps, about 60%. NBC had about 48% and CBS about 43%. Original series product on both CBS and ABC averaged about a 16 rating, compared with NBC's estimated 14 rating.

NBC's series, with "The A Team" being one of the few exceptions, showed little growth in May. NBC's original series episodes often were outranked by CBS' series reruns.

However, NBC continued to enjoy the urban appeal it demonstrated throughout last season. Its stations also placed first during the May sweeps in prime time in the top three markets—New York, Chicago and Los Angeles.

During the May, 1982, sweeps, ABC edged out the competition with a 15.2/27 in Nielsen and a 15.4/27.2 in Arbitron. CBS placed second, averaging a 14.7/26.2 in Nielsen and a 14.7/26.1 in Arbitron. NBC's performance during the most recent ratings book is improved dramatically when compared with the network's 13.9/24.7 in Nielsen and 14/24.7 in Arbitron last year.#

How predictions fared

New York—A year ago, the advertising agency crystal ball gave an overly optimistic view of the upcoming tv season.

Of 71 programs covered by agency executives a year ago, 27 attracted fewer audience share points than predicted, while 11 performed better than the shops thought and 33 met the forecasts within two share points. In fairness, the agency experts were not too far under the mark in the 50 series where higher shares had been anticipated.

The agency predictions proved to be a good measure of a series' chances to stay on the air or be canceled.

For instance, only two of the programs that performed better than predicted were canceled ("Too Close For Comfort" on ABC and "The Powers of Matthew Star" on NBC). Only one show that performed up to forecasts was jettisoned (CBS' "Cagney & Lacey").

By comparison, 24 of the 50 shows performing below agency expectations were axed.

Failing to live up to the agency projections was not necessarily a one-way ticket to oblivion. For example, "60 Minutes" attracted four fewer share points than predicted but still emerged the highest-rated prime time regular.

Still, only the heartiest of shows were able to perform below agency expectations and survive. Statistically, a show that performed as well or better than the agency prediction had a 90% chance of being renewed, while a program not meeting agency expectations had only a 50% chance.

The prophets were generally too optimistic on the performance of newcomer shows for 1982-83. Only seven new shows performed better than projected, while 21 new shows failed to meet expectations.

The most overrated freshman series last year were the short-lived "Gavilan," which came in eight share points below projections, and "The Devlin Connection," six share points below predictions. Both were quickly dropped by NBC.#

23.1. ABC is expected to narrow the margin in the second half of the network season, as it did with this spring's miniseries, "The Winds of War" and "The Thorn Birds," to finish a close second.

Of the new shows this year, only ABC's "Hotel," the Bette Davis vehicle based on the Arthur Hailey novel, is being pegged at a 30 share. "After M*A*S*H" is being assigned a 27 share, while ABC's new "Yes, But I'm Married" with Madeline Kahn is expected to draw a 26 share. No other new series will produce more than a 24 share, according to agency predictions.

Among the new shows marked as certain losers by these agency buyers are CBS' "Cutter to Houston" and "The Whiz Kids"; ABC's "Lottery" and "Trauma Center," and NBC's "The Rousters."

On a night-by-night basis, the executives have ABC emerging as the ratings champ on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Saturday, with CBS winning the remaining three nights. NBC is not expected to win a single night, although the agency forecasters said their predictions could change following the anticipated massive rescheduling at NBC. That shakeup in the schedule could begin even before the start of the fall season.

The highest-rated program next season will again be CBS' "60 Minutes" with a projected average share of 39, the buyers say. The remainder of the top 10 ratings list, according to the agencies, will include: "Dallas" (37 share); "Falcon Crest," "Magnum, P.I.," "Dynasty" and "Monday Night Football" (tied at 34); "Love Boat," (32); "Hill Street Blues" and "Simon & Simon" (tied at 31); "The A Team," "Hart to Hart," "Trapper John, M.D." and "Hotel" (tied at 30).

"NBC Monitor," which last season was the lowest-rated prime time series, is expected to maintain that dubious distinction with an anticipated average 13 share as it moves to a new time period and goes head-to-head with "60 Minutes." Most of the agency forecasters said "Monitor" would survive only as long as NBC believes it is futile to try to throw any other show against "60 Minutes."

The forecasters have predicted that combined network audience shares will range from a low of 70 during the 8 p.m. to 9 p.m. block on Wednesday and Saturday to a high of 87 in the 9 p.m. to 10 p.m. time period on Monday. The Monday share levels, however, are expected to decline after ABC's "Monday Night Football" concludes its schedule.

"Happy Days" is expected to enter its final season as the forecasters believe it will generate only a 22 share, narrowly edging out CBS' "Mississippi" and lagging behind NBC's "The A Team." ABC's "Three's Company" is seen as continuing its relatively strong performance with a 29 share.

NBC's returning series "St. Elsewhere" is not expected to remain on the schedule through the fall, with a predicted average audience share of 20. Most agency experts expect the new NBC series, "The Yellow Rose," now slotted for Saturday night at 10 p.m., to move into the Wednesday night 10 p.m. period, now held by "St. Elsewhere." Another anticipated NBC schedule change involves "Knight Rider." Slotted for Sunday at 8 p.m., it is expected to be moved to the Friday lineup.

"The entire NBC 10 p.m. lineup looks great for affiliates who want to see apparently strong, high-concept shows scheduled as lead-ins for their local news," said an agency forecaster, "but all of the 10 o'clock shows are in the wrong place. Some of these are being wasted, and it's a shame. 'The Yellow Rose' is a real good-looking show, but it's on Saturday night when it's traditionally impossible to build a following for a prime time soap opera. And on top of that," he continued, "it has a sure loser ['The Rousters'] as a lead-in. 'For Love and Honor' is a very well-done production, but it has 'Manimal' as a lead-in and that show is a formula show that wasn't executed well and has to go against 'Dallas.' "

CBS, having recently informed its affiliates that it was holding back some prime time candidates for December launches, when it expects ABC and NBC new-stunting to be over, is expected to need the new shows to fill in for "CBS Wednesday Night Movie" with its anticipated 23 share average. CBS surprised most observers when it announced that it would go into the fall season with three movie nights, especially after CBS stated earlier that theatrical films no longer were generating blockbuster ratings.#

7UP drive tops $40 million

By ROBERT REED

Undaunted by the outrage of its competitors, Seven-Up Co. is charging ahead with a new campaign that lambasts other soft drinks for containing artificial coloring and flavors while claiming that 7UP is free of these additives (AA, May 23).

Also in the wings is a new campaign for Like, Seven-Up's cola, which will begin the second week of June, according to sources.

Already under way, 7UP's massive advertising push builds on the "no-caffeine" positioning, which provided the drink with its first sales increase since 1973. Competitors raged over the approach and then begrudgingly entered the "no-caffeine" category themselves.

The linchpin of the new effort is the theme, "No caffeine. No artificial colors. No artificial flavors." Commercials picture a bevy of other soft drinks that spokesman Geoffrey Holder scoffs at for containing additives. Featured in the spots are Coke, Pepsi, RC Cola, Dr Pepper and many others.

No Caffeine.
No Artificial Color.
No Artificial Flavor.
No wonder 7UP has a clean, refreshing, unspoiled taste.
Don't you feel good about 7UP?

This special "information" ad is set for Time, People and Jet.

Seven-Up's newest message has aired on the three tv networks and will be seen on 77 independent stations and 10 cable networks this summer, according to the St. Louis company.

Spots are supported by a full complement of radio and newspaper ads. Special magazine ads are appearing this week in issues of Jet, People and Time. The insert ads claim to offer "some hard news about soft drinks" and use a comparison chart.

Although Seven-Up officials refused to state the cost of the "no-additive" strategy, they told bottlers it will be more than the "no-caffeine" drive. Seven-Up spent an estimated $40 million to support that push. N W Ayer, New York, is the agency.

Competitors again are angry at the actions of the Philip Morris Inc. subsidiary. Coca-Cola Co. sent a letter to its bottlers calling the new campaign "insidious, false, misleading and detrimental to the industry." To counterattack, Coca-Cola said it soon will break a new "positive" ad campaign for Sprite, its lemon-lime drink.

Dr Pepper Co. officially filed a complaint with the three networks last week, charging Seven-Up with falsely claiming 7UP did not contain additives. Dr Pepper stated its laboratory test found 7UP to have sodium ci-

'No caffeine' choice: 7UP

The potential size of the caffeine-free soft-drink market may be substantially higher than even soft-drink makers have estimated.

It also appears that Seven-Up Co. scored a major coup in tapping that market with its ad campaign stressing the brand's no-caffeine properties: By a substantial margin, 7UP is the caffeine-free soft drink consumers think of first.

Those conclusions emerge from a survey of a random sample of U.S. consumers, conducted for ADVERTISING AGE by SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. In the survey, 1,250 consumers 18 and older were polled; 1,235 of them said they drink soft drinks.

The survey asked respondents to say whether the presence of caffeine in soft drinks makes "a great deal of difference, some difference or no difference" to them. More than 28% of the soft-

Arby's aims new push at kids' market

By SCOTT HUME

Arby's will try to increase its share of the family market next month with the introduction of its first menu offering targeted to children.

With its new Arby's Adventure Meal, the Atlanta-based chain also is introducing "R.B.," a robot, its first children's character.

But after that, its marketing strategy calls for a glassware promotion and new network tv campaign aimed at the adult market that has been its traditional base. The company is counting on adults to support the new image Arby's has begun to fashion.

Arby's Adventure Meal, the 1,200-unit chain's first boxed children's meal, will contain an Arby's Junior roast beef sandwich, small order of fries, small soft drink and a toy. Packaging features an outer-space theme (timed to "Return of the Jedi's" release) and introduces the robot character that will be used extensively in point-of-purchase material.

Information packets being sent to Arby's franchise owners explain that the Adventure Meal was developed "to help Arby's increase its share of business from families with small children." The chain's menu and marketing programs traditionally have been targeted to adults 18 to 49.

Syndie football big affiliate lure

By CRAIG REISS

NEW YORK—Network tv prime time ratings will be substantially below normal for Aug. 29, when at least 17% of all network affiliates will preempt regular programing to carry the syndicated "Kickoff Classic" college football game.

The network preemptions are being viewed as evidence that future one-time-only syndicated sports specials can play havoc with network programing strategies and affiliate loyalty.

The "Kickoff Classic," a new college football game that will pit Penn State, last year's top-ranked team, against Nebraska, the top contender selected by a coaches' committee, reportedly has been picked up by 130 stations—45 NBC affiliates, 33 ABC and 33 CBS affiliates and 19 independent stations.

In one week, the game being syndicated by Katz Sports has cleared 46 of the top 50 markets (including 33 of the top 50 affiliates) and has reached about 79% clearance of U.S. tv households. The game will be played in Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J.

The number of network affiliates carrying the game is expected to increase in the next few weeks as additional markets are cleared. But already the game appears to have attracted a record number of affiliates for a syndicated sports special.

The game, starting at 9 p.m. (ET), occurs just weeks before the start of the new fall prime time schedule. NBC has scheduled three or four days of "The Godfather" movies to run through Aug. 29 in order to build momentum as it enters the new fall season, but that programing move is rendered

Ad industry topped others in recession

By ROBERT J. COEN
Senior vp, McCann-Erickson

For the first time in recent history, advertising has outpaced other sectors of the economy during a business slowdown. This reflects a change in the way marketers look at advertising's role in a recession.

In past recessions, the advertising industry's share of the gross national product has tended to drop or flatten out, but advertising growth in 1982 was much stronger than the rest of the economy.

During 1982, the U.S. economy declined by 1.7% in real terms. Most industries experienced declines in their unit volumes of between 1% and 3%. The weak economy and worldwide oil glut helped to reduce the inflation rate substantially below the double-digit levels of previous years.

The over-all GNP deflator rose just 6% on average for all months of 1982 compared with 1981, and consumer prices rose only 4% from December, 1981, to December, 1982. Thus, most industries experienced reduced physical volume with revenue increases of only 3% to 5%. Total GNP, which declined in real terms, grew only 4.1% when inflation is considered.

Advertising industry revenues increased about 10% in 1982, and although many media failed to perform as expansively as they had in previous years, they really did far better than most other industries.

Advertising demand posted real gains in 1982. It actually contributed to some of this real gain, since rebate-type advertising proved to be significant for the first time in a major recession. Special price promotions extended to many areas other than automobiles. Airlines world news roundup

LONDON—Young & Rubicam and British-based Collett Dickinson Pearce by Sept. 1 will announce that they will set up a jointly owned company, CDP International, with CDP holding a majority share initially, to provide clients with a separate and "creative" international network (AA, May 23). It will operate independently of Y&R's existing agencies and may stretch beyond Europe.

HAMBURG—Gruner & Jahr confirmed that the forged Hitler diaries cost the company $8.3 million. This includes $3.9 million for the fake manuscripts, $1.25 million each in severance pay for the two ousted Stern editors and $1.7 million for travel and research.

LONDON—Satellite Television, the satellite broadcasting company that newspaper magnate Rupert Murdoch likely will take over, this week will learn if the government will allow the service to enter France by supplying programs to a Paris hotel. This could pave the way for all French hotels and cable systems eventually to have access to the service.

SAO PAULO—N W Ayer International, making a new Latin American push, is negotiating to buy minority shares in ad agencies in Brazil, Mexico and Venezuela before the end of 1983.

MEXICO CITY—Apple Computer will manufacture in November a version of its Apple IIe personal computer for Latin markets, in a joint venture with an unnamed Mexican company in Guadalajara. Dieste, Merino/BBDO will handle.

MONTREAL—Cockfield Brown, Canada's only publicly held ad agency, was declared bankrupt last week. Trustee Andre Giroux told creditors he hopes to pay 75% of the company's $5 million debt.

Nimslo, Ogilvy break up

By GAY JERVEY

NEW YORK—The secretive Nimslo Corp., its 3-D photography system floundering, has quietly parted with its first and only agency, Ogilvy & Mather.

What remains uncertain is who will handle an account once considered to be worth $25 million, and—more importantly—whether Nimslo can overcome a widening credibility gap fostered by 3-D's disappointing debut and corporate reticence concerning its financial performance.

Ogilvy & Mather would only confirm that it no longer handles Nimslo. The parting was described as a natural by-product of a recent Berkey/Nimslo deal that saw Ber-

Ad awareness springs ahead in April

By JOSEPH M. WINSKI

adWatch

Aided by fresh advertising and increased spending, more advertisers posted significant gains in awareness last month than in any month since ADVERTISING AGE began publishing results of advertising awareness surveys in April, 1982.

Last month's scores were the highest to date for most of those advertisers. Sixteen advertisers recorded statistically significant increases in awareness last month. Only two advertisers mentioned by respondents—Burger King and Diet Coke—suffered significant declines.

Burger King's archrival, McDonald's, was one of the big gainers, posting its highest adWatch score to date.

In the survey, conducted by SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb., a random sample of 1,250 consumers was asked to identify the advertising that first came to mind of all seen, read or heard in various product categories in the previous 30 days. The survey was conducted by telephone from April 1 through April 21.

Other big gainers last month included Eastman Kodak and Polaroid, both apparently beneficiaries of ad themes introduced last month and a spring push to sell cameras for gift-giving; Wrigley chewing gum; Apple Computer, which has been heavily advertising its new Lisa model, and Coca-Cola, which continues to withstand Pepsi-Cola's new "Pepsi Now" campaign.

In one of consumer marketing's closest-watched ad battles, McDonald's scored heavily at Burger King's expense in April, and in the process seemed to demonstrate again that Burger King's hit-and-run comparative ads lack staying power. Burger King phased out its latest anti-McDonald's spots—stressing Burger King's "flame broiling" vs. McDonald's "frying"—and dropped 5.3 points in awareness, to 16.2% of the responses.

McDonald's continued to give heavy exposure to its "McDonald's and You" spots and rose 8.5 points in awareness to 49.8%.

McDonald's record April score also suggests that Leo Burnett USA, which received the account when McDonald's dropped NH&S/USA despite that agency's acclaimed work, is fashioning impressive McDonald's credentials in its own right. The BK agency is J. Walter Thompson USA.

Wendy's was again No. 3 in fast-foods, with 3.4% of the responses, about the same as in March. Wendy's has promised to introduce its "most dramatic advertising" in years next month (AA, May 9).

The biggest April gainer was Kodak; 27.9% of the consumers surveyed in April said Kodak advertising came to mind first of all camera and equipment advertising seen or heard in the previous 30 days. That was up 9.8 points from March and was Kodak's second-highest adWatch score. Canon remained No. 2 in the category with 14.1% of the responses (vs. 11.4% in March), but No. 3 Polaroid moved to within a point of Canon with 13.1%, up 5.1 points.

Kodak in April broke new campaigns for its color paper and stepped up advertising for its disc cameras. Polaroid last month introduced emotional-appeal commercials for instant photography with the theme, "The sharing makes the memories sweeter."

In soft drinks, it was the company with the "old" advertising—Coca-Cola—making the big move in April, while Pepsi-Cola, which recently launched a new campaign, remained flat. Coke's awareness rose 5.4 points to 28.6%, one of its highest adWatch scores, while Pepsi's awareness was not statistically different at 19.7% of the responses vs. 20.3% in March. Coke's 8.9-point adWatch margin over Pepsi is the largest it's been.

Diet Coke, however, suffered a significant 3.8-point decline in April and yielded the No. 3 spot it had claimed in February and March to 7UP. That soft drink received 5.2% of the responses (vs. 4.6% in March) to Diet Coke's 4.6%.

It was a big month for Wrigley chewing gum. In the gum & candy category, "Wrigley" advertising was named by 13% of the respondents, up 7.1 points, while Wrigley's Doublemint was No. 2 with 7.6%, up 4.2 points. Snicker's was No. 3 with 6.2%, up from 4.3%. Yet another Wrigley entry, Spearmint gum, was No. 4 with 4.6%. The April scores of all three Wrigley entries were their highest to date in adWatch.

But Wrigley, unlike some other advertisers with improved scores, didn't launch any new advertising last month or increase spending.

Marlboro fell from No. 1 in tobacco products for the first time, even though its awareness score rose slightly, to 5.6% from 5.1%. It was replaced by Kool, which received 6.2% of the responses, a significant 4.1-point increase. That was the first time any advertiser in the category achieved a statistically significant increase. It was also the first time Kool ranked among the top three. Skoal fell to No. 3 from No. 2.

Kool last month vigorously backed a sweepstakes promotion offering a black Porsche as top prize; the event reportedly has been drawing a heavy response. Kool continued its seemingly ubiquitous print and outdoor campaign identifying the Brown & Williamson brand with jazz music. Nearly one third of the respondents naming Kool ads said they saw them on outdoor boards, by far the highest percentage of outdoor ads cited for any adWatch advertiser.

Another new category leader last month was Procter & Gamble's Ivory, with 7.4% of the responses in soap and shampoos, vs. 5.9% in March. P&G's Tide, which has led the laundry products category every month, received its best score yet in April, with 28.2% of the responses, up a significant 5.4 points from March, when it had posted a significant 4.2-point gain.

Apple Computer, which apparently stepped up spending to advertise its Lisa model, also had its best adWatch score in April; it solidified its No. 2 rank in home electronics with 8% of the responses, up 4.2 points from March. Atari, the consistent leader in the group, received 13.6% of the responses, down from 15% in March and from 26.2% in December.#

trate and citric acid and these additives dispute the Seven-Up position.

The networks are investigating the issue, but have allowed the spots to run. Seven-Up contends sodium citrate and citric acid do not come under the Food & Drug Administration's heading of artificial flavors or colors and so do not undercut its message.

Edward Frantel, president of Seven-Up, disputed competitors' claims that the nonadditive campaign is negative and destined to hurt the industry. Mr. Frantel sees the push as a positive means of informing the public.

"It is our firm belief that the soft-drink consumer should have information that allows them to make an informed purchase decision about the soft drinks he or she purchases, either for personal consumption or for children," Mr. Frantel said at a press conference last week to officially kick off the marketing drive.

The company also disputed claims that its bottlers were angered over the new tactic. A spot check of Seven-Up bottlers that carried a major cola found they were angry over the approach, but Charles Schmid, vp-franchise, said nearly all its bottlers were behind the effort.

In other Seven-Up news, the acquisition of major bottler Joyce Beverages by All-American Bottling Corp., a company backed by the Cisneros Group of Venezuela, has been called off. In the works since March, the deal was terminated because Seven-Up feared All-American would stop distributing Like and replace it with RC Cola, according to an industry source. The Cisneros Group owns nearly 40% of RC Cola's bottling capacity in the U.S.

Since its debut, Like has had trouble getting distribution and is currently in 50% of the country. Joyce has bottling plants in Chicago, New Rochelle, N.Y., and Forestville, Md.

Seven-Up and Joyce officials declined to comment.#

drink consumers responded that it made a great deal of difference. Another 13% said it made some difference. About 56% said it made no difference, and 2% said they didn't know.

Assuming that those who said the presence of caffeine makes some or a lot of difference were expressing a preference for soft drinks with reduced caffeine, the survey suggests a potential market of about 40% of adult soft-drink consumers. (Teen agers and children, who were not surveyed, presumably would have less-pronounced anti-caffeine feelings.)

The results indicate a considerably larger potential market than has been projected by some in the industry. A Coca-Cola Co. spokesman, for example, said the company estimates that caffeine-free colas will account for about 15% of the total soft-drink market by early 1985, up from about 7% to 8% this year. Adding 7UP, the largest noncola, no-caffeine soft drink with an estimated 5.2% market share, still results in a total share for all caffeine-free soft drinks well below the potential suggested by the poll.

Asked to name the caffeine-free soft drink that first came to mind, 41% of the consumers questioned said 7UP—more than four times the 10% who named runner-up Pepsi Free.

Seven-Up broke its then-controversial "no-caffeine" ad campaign in the middle of last year. That effort helped Seven-Up Co. regain the No. 3 spot among soft-drink companies, according to industry analyst John Maxwell.

Pepsi-Cola was the third most-named no-caffeine soft drink in the poll, with 8% of all responses, and Coca-Cola was fourth with 6% of the responses. Both Pepsi-Cola and Coca-Cola contain caffeine. Like, a Seven-Up Co. cola that is caffeine-free, was No. 5 in mentions, with 4% of responses.

Concern about caffeine presence generally was highest among women and among consumers earning $20,000 to $40,000. Concern was also higher, relative to their share of the total sample, among consumers 25-to-44-years-old than among older or younger groups. There was no significant geographical variation in the responses. While 7UP and Pepsi Free were named by roughly the same percentage of women and men as were in the total sample, two-thirds of those naming Like were women.#

R.B. the robot does not yet signal another attempt to reposition Arby's. "While it is not realistic or desirable to make Arby's a children's fast-food restaurant, it is desirable to get a larger share of the family business," says a memo to franchisees from sales promotion manager Bette Justice.

That reluctance to fully commit itself to children's marketing extends to the advertising that will support the promotion. What separates the Adventure Meal from the "fun meals" offered periodically by Burger King, McDonald's and others is Arby's intention to market its version as a convenience for adults rather than as a treat for children.

Tv spots for local use created by Grey Advertising, New York, the chain's national agency, are targeted "to the mother [adult purchaser] with the child as the secondary target audience," according to the promotion packet. As a result, the company is recommending to franchisees that they concentrate local tv buys in early fringe to "maximize your reach of Arby's primary market," women 18 to 34. Spot radio, newspaper ads with coupons and free-standing inserts also will be used.

On June 26, a four-week promotion targeted to 18-to-34-year-olds will kick off. Participating stores will offer Arby's Sports Nut Glasses, a set of 13-oz. on-the-rocks glasses with humorous sports scenes by cartoonist Gary Patterson. Local tv, radio and newspaper advertising again will support.

Finally, Arby's plans a return to network tv in late July, with a campaign for the Deli Sandwich line it introduced last year in its attempt to position itself as full-menu rather than just a roast beef chain.

Last October, the company abandoned its 2-year-old "America's roast beef, yes sir" theme in favor of the more flexible "You say Arby's, you've said a mouthful." Soon after, it dropped its agency, Lois Pitts Gershon, New York, and named Grey the successor in January. That slogan will continue in the tv spots this summer as the company works to strengthen consumer perception of the new full-menu Arby's.

"You have to be careful with product proliferation," senior vp-marketing Larry Krueger said. "Companies come out with new products all the time and then abandon them. We're trying to position Arby's for the '80s, and if you change your message too many times, you merely confuse your customers. We're trying to stay with a unified message."

But another potentially major change for the chain's identity is lurking in the wings. A test of barbecued rib platters and barbecued chicken and pork sandwiches continues in Louisville (AA, April 4).

Backed by a campaign themed, "Arby's barbecue is calling you," the test will be expanded to additional markets this summer.#

Ad industry strong

spent heavily to fill empty seats, as did hotels and resorts during the peak season to fill rooms and facilities.

These practices were copied by other marketers experiencing sluggish business conditions. The major advertisers of nondurable consumer products competed more intensely for market share than they had in the past, when maintenance of schedules and the slowdown in new-product entries tended to be the norm.

The good showing of the advertising industry really becomes apparent when we examine the trend in advertising as a percentage of the GNP.

In 1972, the economy was strong. It was a year of presidential elections and Olympics. Advertising amounted to 1.957% of the GNP. In 1973, the normal postelection-year pattern set in and was aggravated further by the oil crisis in the fall of 1973. Thus, advertising as a percentage of GNP plummeted to 1.883% and continued downward during the deep and extended 1974-75 recession, touching bottom in 1975.

In 1976, a year of economic recovery, advertising spending soared and the ratio of it to the economy moved sharply upward, close to the 1972 level. From 1976 to 1979, advertising grew faster than the economy, so the rate continued to rise. Advertising was growing in importance and assuming a relatively more important marketing role each year.

In 1980, there was a decline in the economy, but so brief that it failed to affect the ratio of advertising to GNP as usually had happened in the past. In 1981, the economy experienced only sporadic periods of real growth, and 1982 proved to be a year of significant economic decline.

If the past had repeated itself, we would have seen at least a flattening in the ratio of advertising to the economy. Instead, there was the sharpest upturn since 1976. This means that the role of advertising in a soft economy has changed considerably from the holding or cutback strategies that were most prevalent in the past.

In 1982, every medium except farm publications and trade papers posted revenue gains equal to or in excess of the normal GNP growth of 4.1%. Magazine advertising pages declined in 1982, but higher rates resulted in revenue gains of 5% despite considerable weakness in liquor and cigaret advertising—two of magazines' most important categories.

Newspapers in many markets experienced painful reductions in advertising linage by key retailers and in their highly profitable help-wanted and real-estate classified listings. These losses were offset partially by some heavy rebate schedules, but most of the 1982 newspaper revenue growth was due to double-digit rate increases.

Demand for tv advertising time continued to expand, and the result was much higher prices for both network and spot commercial time. Modest increases in commercial volume, combined with double-digit rate increases, resulted in another record year in ad revenue growth for this medium.

The only medium that responded to the decline in energy costs with a rate reduction was direct mail. The U.S. Postal Service reduced postal rates in a number of major advertising categories, and mail volume grew significantly.

The decline in postage cost and the growth in the size of the average mailing permitted additional economies in printing and production costs on a per-piece basis, resulting in a further reduction on a cost-per-thousand basis. This proved to be the opposite of the experience in tv, where double-digit rate increases often were accompanied by a decline in audience delivery, with the result that cpm soared.

Despite the economy and the exceptionally high rate increases for many media, the volume of advertising messages rose again in 1982. For the first time in recent history, total advertising demand increased during an economic slowdown. Advertising budgets for many goods and services continued to grow, despite the economy, and in some cases intensified because of the recession.

The unusual performance of the ad industry in 1982 normally would suggest that a period of adjustment is due. But limited media reports for the opening months of the year indicate no reversal in the trend toward greater use of advertising as a marketing tool.

Most forecasts for GNP growth fall somewhere between 7% and 8%, while ad revenue indications for most media are about 10%. Advertising growth in 1983 is likely again to outpace the growth of the rest of the economy.

With total U.S. advertising growing almost 10% in 1983, advertising as a per cent of GNP should rise to more than 2.2%. We look for a 1983 index point of about 112 or 113.

Advertising will continue to play an increasingly important marketing role in the U.S. economy this year and in the immediate future. Advertising demand will continue strong, but media price increases should come more into line with general inflation rates. As strengthened resistance to media prices helps moderate their pace, annual advertising growth and economic growth will come closer into agreement.

Several years ago, the Newspaper Advertising Bureau recognized the need to tighten its estimates. After a great deal of work, the bureau now is providing estimates based on a much more solid set of facts.

Through its extensive r&d, the bureau has determined the previous estimating procedures had led to a gradual inflation in the estimated advertising expenditures projections. As a result of these discoveries, the bureau has issued revised newspaper advertising expenditure figures for 1981 and 1982 as well as for previous years that were affected significantly by the previous procedures.

Recent budget cuts have eliminated many advertising industry statistics collected by the federal government. The greatest losses have been the discontinuance of the Federal Communications Commission financial reports on the broadcast media. 1980 was the last year that advertising expenditure estimates for tv and radio were based on these authoritative reports.

Current radio and tv ad numbers still are quite reliable, since they have been extended only two years since 1980. But, as time passes, confidence in their accuracy may be eroded.

The key to the reliability of the new broadcast estimates is the accuracy of the reports on year-to-year change in advertising revenues. Tv is easier to monitor than radio. Furthermore, the tv industry provides more extensive data than radio.

A more comprehensive factual base for estimating year-to-year changes in spot and local radio advertising is needed, and it is hoped the radio industry will provide more factual information to fill the void left when the FCC reports were discontinued.

In the past, we have used government reports to check periodically on the credibility of a number of specific media estimates as well as some of the major items contained in our miscellaneous category. As the availability of government benchmark statistics declines, it will be necessary to obtain more factual data from private industry sources.#

The McCann-Erickson national advertising indexes are key barometers of the month-to-month changes in national advertising spending. These indexes are seasonally adjusted measures of the monthly advertising revenues for the major national media. The general index is a composite of net tv, spot tv, magazines and newspaper expenditures by national advertisers and they are all based on the year 1967, which is equal to 100.

Confusion mars Belgrade meeting of IAA

By HOWARD SHARMAN

BELGRADE—Aristides Katoppo, an Indonesian publisher, was standing in a Belgrade coffee bar taking a break from the first International Advertising Assn. conference on advertising ever held in an Eastern European country, when a conference official appeared at his elbow.

Would he go to the conference organizers' office, he was asked. There he was pressed to speak to the next session of the conference, starting in 10 minutes. He agreed to do so and made what one observer called a "brave effort."

That scene was typical of the four-day conference, attended by only 300 delegates—70 from outside Yugoslavia. Amid a constantly changing schedule (which arrived in final form only on the last day) and the lack of any big-name speakers, the sparse audience only really came to life for one session on the second day. On the agenda were five big U.S. agencies presenting case histories and advertising campaigns.

Leo Burnett Co., Doyle Dane Bernbach, McCann-Erickson, Ogilvy & Mather and J. Walter Thompson Co. went through the familiar stories of Green Giant, Volkswagen, Coca-Cola, American Express and Lux soap, respectively. This appeared to be what the mainly Yugoslav audience had been waiting for, because the audience at the other sessions was so thin one can assume a large number of people had registered for the conference to attend only this session.

The original idea behind the meeting was that North, meaning the developed world, should meet South, the developing countries. The conference also was designed to boost the image of advertising in Eastern Europe, and in Yugoslavia particularly.

The North-South dialog was enhanced in a speech by Antonio Pasquali, deputy assistant director general for communications at the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, which is studying whether to encourage countries to impose guidelines on the content of ads in the Third World.

So far, the group has denied the IAA even "observer" status at its sessions, but Mr. Pasquali said UNESCO "could reach a level of cooperation" with the IAA, which was taken as a positive signal by the delegates.

Yugoslavia, the site of UNESCO's original declarations, sees itself as a leader of the nonaligned countries and as a kind of bridge between the developed countries of Western Europe and North America and the Third World. But Third World delegates, who were few and far between, were as critical of the marketing and organization of the conference as the professionals from the U.S. and U.K.

One delegate from the Far East said the Yugoslav organizers had not marketed the conference properly, and others commented on the relatively high registration fee, which included no meals or coffee during intermissions, the absence of big-name speakers and an insufficiently attractive travel package.

The Yugoslavs complained about the lack of support they have received from the international agencies and world media, saying this probably is because agencies and media see little prospect of finding clients either in Yugoslavia or in the Third World.

To bolster the image of advertising to the local government, a number of senior Yugoslav government figures spoke at the conference, including the prime minister, who opened the meeting. But missing from the conference was a discussion of some of the issues surrounding advertising and development in the Third World, such as the role of multinational companies and agencies.

While the Yugoslav delegates are keen to develop the local advertising industry and are willing to learn from foreign practitioners, government speakers seem to see marketing and advertising as techniques to be used mainly in exporting and then mainly in the business-to-business sphere, with much talk of trade fairs and the distribution of product information.#

Renfield breaks ad drive

NEW YORK—Renfield Importers is breaking a spring-summer radio and tv campaign for Giacobazzi wine via Stan Merritt Advertising. Ads will appear in 35 markets on 122 radio stations and on more than 80 tv stations.

The Giacobazzi budget is estimated at $2 million-plus.

Hard-hitting ads inflame U.K. elections

By SEAN MILMO

LONDON—New go-for-the-throat political advertising has become an issue in the national elections in the U.K., but it could benefit the advertising agencies responsible for it.

The main target is Saatchi & Saatchi, the agency for the ruling Conservative Party and forerunner of the now common practice of political parties hiring full-service agencies to handle the campaigns for the election, set for June 9 (AA, May 9).

Opposition Labour Party leader Michael Foot challenged the Conservatives to withdraw one ad that claimed voters for Labour would be renouncing basic rights like the free choice of schools and the option to buy their rented homes.

According to Mr. Foot, the Conservative ads were "so shameless in their peddling of falsehoods that they would be forbidden in the normal advertising world." He complains the problem is "political advertising doesn't have to be decent, honest or true."

One Saatchi ad targeting the U.K.'s ethnic communities was rejected by the Caribbean Times, the country's largest ethnic newspaper, on the grounds that it was "insulting, obnoxious and immoral." The ad details the Conservatives' approach to race alongside a picture of a smartly dressed black with the message: "Labour says he's black, Tories say he's British."

But within the advertising world, the Saatchis have so far won the most praise. "They have done a highly competent job with advertising that has been consistent with the Conservatives' strategy," says John Wood, chairman of Wood Brigdale, which once pitched the Conservatives' account.

The furor surrounding the Saatchi campaign is seen by some as a deliberate ploy to draw maximum attention to the ads.

But there are some doubts about whether the Saatchis can squeeze much more advantage out of the Conservatives' account. The spinoffs from the 1979 triumph that brought Conservative leader Margaret Thatcher into power helped boost Saatchi to the position of Britain's biggest agency.

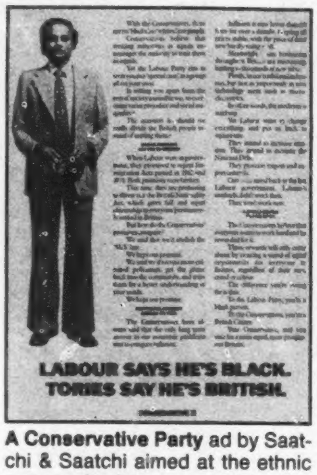
"Maintaining a success makes less of a story than achieving one," says Ron Leagas, managing director of Saatchi & Saatchi four years ago and now running his own agency, Leagas Delaney Partnership.

The other two agencies in the campaign—Wright & Partners for Labour and Gold Greenlees Trott for the Social Democratic-Liberal Party alliance—could stand to gain even more than Saatchi, which is already well known.

Wright & Partners should get the biggest boost. As Johnny Wright, a former director at Grey Advertising, London, says: "It should create much more awareness of the agency and make it easier for us to get on short lists."

Wright's most eye-catching ad for Labour has been a montage of people being broomed down a drain, with the headline: "Are you going to vote yourself out of a job?"

The agency has received some heat from ad executives for taking on the Labour account because of the hostility of some sections of the left-wing party to the advertising industry. Says Mr. Wright: "We're fully aware of the risks but we don't think there's much danger of a backlash."#



LABOUR SAYS HE'S BLACK.
TORIES SAY HE'S BRITISH.

A Conservative Party ad by Saatchi & Saatchi aimed at the ethnic community has come under fire from some groups.

Some sobering facts about the gimlet.

This gimlet isn't made of vodka and lime juice. It's made of steel and wood.

And this gimlet isn't served with a twist. It's simply twisted by hand—often used by the do-it-yourselfer instead of a conventional wood drill to bore a hole for starting a wood screw.

But the little gimlet is only part of a bigger story. The Bureau of Building Marketing Research estimates that by 1990, do-it-yourselfers will be spending between 112 billion to 118 billion dollars on all the products they need, gimlets included. That's a lot of money ... spent by lots and lots of people.

MECHANIX ILLUSTRATED is reaching out to every one of them. We continue to run the highest percentage of DIY editorial in our field and continue to show the largest readership growth of any "how-to" publication.

According to SMRB, MI now reaches almost 5 million people.

Put your ad dollars in MI...where the demand for your product will grow right along with the steel gimlet. Then, go out and have a vodka gimlet to celebrate.

John Blair dies at 83

NAPLES, FLA.—John P. Blair, 83, chairman emeritus of John Blair & Co., who helped invent the broadcast station representation business, died May 25 in Naples Community Hospital here. He had been in poor health for some time.

Mr. Blair had retired from the $322 million graphics and communications company in 1966, although he continued to serve on the board for another 10 years.

A native Chicagoan, he worked for J. Walter Thompson Co. before borrowing on his life insurance policy in 1933 to open Greig, Blair & Spight to provide exclusive sales representation for radio stations, a new idea for a new medium. Two years later he acquired a majority interest in the company, renaming it John Blair & Co.

When tv emerged to upstage radio, Mr. Blair in 1948 was first to form a spot tv sales division. Now publicly held, his company handles 120 tv and 196 radio stations, but has diversified into station ownership, coupon marketing and commercial printing as well.

Mr. Blair helped to found and later served as president of the Station Representatives Assn. and was involved in the formation of the Radio Advertising Bureau and Television Bureau of Advertising.#

corrections & clarifications

- Due to a footnoting error, Benton & Bowles' vacation policy incorrectly was listed as being based on one's salary levels and not length of service (AA, May 23, P. 20).
- Boston Globe Sunday magazine incorrectly reported its January through April, 1982, linage figure. It should read 623.5 (AA, May 23, P. 82).
- Young & Rubicam is the agency for General Foods' Ping Pong bubble gum in Brazil, not Leo Burnett Co. (AA, May 23, P. 90).
- Patrick Morin is chief executive officer of Griswold Co., Cleveland. His name was misspelled in an earlier story (AA, May 23, P. 96).

Direct Marketing

By Bob Stone

Now, a bigger bargain

Fact: The average industrial sales call now costs in excess of $200, as opposed to $96.79 in 1977.

Fact: For the first time in history, direct marketers are spending more for telephone as a medium than for direct mail.

Fact: The average cost of a typical direct mail package in a 50,000 quantity came to $355.99 per thousand in 1982—an increase of only 0.11% over 1981.

These are but a few of thousands of facts contained in the Direct Marketing Assn. "1983 Fact Book on Direct Marketing." The 259-page book is a storehouse of information for practitioner and would-be practitioner.

A sample of subjects listed in the table of contents indicates the breadth of coverage: The Scope of Direct Marketing, Business-to-Business Direct Marketing, Consumer Attitudes and Behavior, Changing Markets, New Product Development, New Electronic Media, Delivery Systems, Credit and Collection, Financial Planning, Glossary of Terms. It's all there.

There are more than 100 charts in the compendium, and they contain an incredible number of facts—all vital to planning and comprehending the total scope of direct marketing.

Illustrated here is one of these charts: Percentage Ordering Mail Order Items in Past 12 Months, a Simmons Market Research Bureau study. Let's take a close look.

Note that females are more apt to be mail order buyers than males. Looking at age brackets, propensity to be a mail order buyer peaks in the 35 to 44 age bracket.

The propensity to be a mail order buyer correlates with degrees of education. Lumping all types of mail order purchases together, including magazine subscriptions, the following emerges. A healthy 54.7% of college graduates are mail order buyers, whereas 50.8% of those who attended college but did not graduate are mail order buyers.

The propensity to be a mail order buyer drops down to 48.5% for high school graduates and hits a low of 34.2% for those who did not graduate from high school. The correlation between income and propensity to purchase via mail order is reinforced in another chart, which discloses that 53.5% of households headed by a person with an income of $25,000-plus made a mail order purchase within a 12-month period.

But as the income goes down, so does the purchasing percentage: $20,000 to $24,999—51.4%; $15,000 to $19,999—48.6%; $10,000 to $14,999—43.0%; $5,000 to $9,999—36.6%; under $5,000—23.0%.

These facts lead to an obvious question: Is the trend toward $25,000 family incomes favorable or unfavorable? There's a chart in the fact book that indicates family incomes of $25,000 and up will be enjoyed by 31% of the population by 1985, as contrasted to 20% back in 1975. So this projection bodes well for the future.

Returning to the chart illustrated here, categories of products purchased are worthy of study.

Certainly it is no surprise that magazines are the No. 1 category for direct response. But the fact that clothing is the second most popular mail order category on the chart is a surprise. It's a surprise until one studies the ever-increasing number of females in the work force (independent incomes and little time to shop).

The final example I'd like to give from the DMA Fact Book concerns consumer attitudes about mail order. A Better Homes and Gardens study quoted in the book reveals two overriding reasons for mail order purchases: (1) Can't find items elsewhere, 33% of respondents, and (2) convenience, 27% of respondents. These are the two major reasons. But also worthy of note is that 7% listed fun as a reason for mail order shopping. I like that.

The Direct Marketing Assn. is to be complimented for an outstanding compilation. I commend its fact book to all practitioners and would-be practitioners. Here's how it's available. Write to: "1983 Fact Book on Direct Marketing," Direct Marketing Assn., 6 East 43rd St., New York, N.Y. 10017. It costs $39.95 for DMA members and $69.95 for nonmembers.

A look back, a look forward

Parting Shot

By Rance Crain

French magazine publisher and iconoclast Daniel Filipacchi is bound and determined to get back into the U.S.

In fact his U.S. adviser, Bob Gutwillig, says flatly Filipacchi will be back here on a regular basis in 1984.

Mr. Filipacchi, as you may remember, tried to revive Look in this country back in 1979 and went on to drop $13 million before giving it up. Mr. Gutwillig now says one of the problems was that it looked too much like Mr. Filipacchi's big success in France, Paris Match.

But now, four years later, the Filipacchi magazine empire is going great guns. The main man is running not only his own 12 magazines, including Lui, the Playboy look-alike, but 30 more belonging to Hachette, France's oldest publishing house. That addition was the result of a takeover bid for Hachette organized by Daniel Filipacchi's friend, Jean-Luc Lagardere.

One of Hachette's major magazines is Elle, a woman's magazine, and this fall Hachette will publish a one-shot edition of Elle in the U.S. The issue, containing a maximum of 50 ad pages, ties in with Bloomingdale's Fete de France promotion in all of the retailer's 14 stores (including outlets in Boston, Washington and a new one opening in Dallas).

Elle editors will put on fashion shows in Bloomingdale stores with Galleries Lafayette, a leading department store chain in France. And Hachette will fly in advertisers to New York and Washington to meet French officials and executives of American ad agencies, media and advertisers.

The Elle one-shot enables Mr. Filipacchi to keep a toe in the U.S. market—he dipped another toe in with another one-shot for Look after Princess Grace's death—and Bob Gutwillig told me that Hachette will definitely enter the U.S. market next year with either regular editions of Look or Elle or an acquisition. He added that both Elle and Lui are published in Japan, and Hachette will probably try Paris Match there in 1984-1985.

The hottest magazine in Japan is a new weekly picture magazine called Focus, which is selling 1 million copies a week, so Mr. Filipacchi obviously thinks there's room for another.

I ran into Bob Gutwillig during the publisher-to-publisher trade mission that brought 15 American magazine publishers to three European cities in four days. In between sessions with European publishers from IPC, The Economist, Gruner & Jahr, L'Express and the Filipacchi-Hachette Group, we dined—oh, how we dined!—with Helmut Schmidt and Gruner & Jahr executives and their wives at the Castle Breitenberg outside of Hamburg; with Hachette management and spouses at Tour d'Argent on the Left Bank in Paris, and with members of the Periodical Publishers Assn. at the Carlton Club on St. James Street in London. We all had to loosen our belts a notch or two, but as we sandwiched in a final lunch at Monet's studio outside of Paris I didn't hear any complaints.

ABC leads ratings in key demographics

New York—CBS-TV was the acknowledged leader in the 1982-83 prime time tv season, but ABC scored better with the demographic group that most national advertisers regard as key—the 18-to-49-year-olds.

ABC, whose prime time fare attracted 8% more of that group than CBS and 15% more than NBC for the full season, clearly hopes to build on that performance for the season ahead.

ABC led CBS among men and women 18 to 34. NBC narrowly edged CBS among those men. As for viewers 25 to 54, CBS was the women's preference over ABC, but ABC drew the most males, according to the full-season A.C. Nielsen Co. data. CBS' viewer profile is on the older side, with about 37% of its adult audience aged 55 and older.

Twenty-nine per cent of ABC's audience was 55 and older, while 64% was in the 18-to-49 bracket. For CBS, 55% of its viewers were 18 to 49. NBC also showed a younger profile, with 63% of its adult audience 18 to 49, vs. 30% aged 55 and up. About 58% of ABC's audience, meanwhile, was in the 25-to-54-year-old grouping, compared with 57% for NBC and 52% for CBS.

On a nightly basis for the season, Nielsen research showed ABC won five of the seven nights among women 18 to 49 and four nights among such males. CBS won Thursdays and Fridays among the females, while NBC won Thursdays and Fridays among the men, as CBS led among those males on Saturdays.

Besides capturing seven of the top 10 program rankings among women 18 to 49 (vs. three for CBS and one for NBC), ABC had three more series to give it 10 of the top 15 positions ("ABC Sunday Movie," "Fall Guy" and "Happy Days"). When looking at the top 15, CBS added two other series, "Newhart" and "Simon & Simon."

Among the male viewers 18 to 49, ABC had four of the top 10 and eight of the top 15 (including "Three's Company," "ABC Monday Movie," "That's Incredible" and "High Performance"). CBS had three of the male top 10 series, as did NBC.#

Agencies in global land rush

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

Like the land rush days of the Old West, advertising agencies here and abroad are posturing for a mad dash to acquire additional international turf.

Recent indications that major overseas expansion is the direction in which many agencies are headed stem from the following:

- Young & Rubicam, in acquiring a "substantial minority interest" in Collett Dickenson Pearce, London (AA, May 30), said it will help Collett expand in Europe.
- Scali, McCabe, Sloves, thirsting to become a giant international network, has been seeking to regain an undisclosed portion of its stock, now owned 100% by Ogilvy & Mather (AA, May 30). Scali has talked with Havas and two other international networks about coventures presumably snagged by the fact that O&M has complete financial control of the autonomous Scali agency.
- Noncommittal replies by Saatchi & Saatchi, London, and McCaffrey & McCall, New York, concerning possible co-venture or merger talks (AA, May 30).
- N W Ayer's bid to acquire mi-

Sedelmaier's kind of Wendy's people

New commercials for Wendy's fast-food chain by noted director Joe Sedelmaier are meant to portray humorously what it calls the "victimization" of consumers by competitors (AA, May 23). These three spots depict "through the mill" hamburgers that are "conveyed, steamed, dropped and microwaved" (top); foods precooked "back there" out of view of the purchaser (middle), and the long waits in line—"step aside"—when a special topping is requested (bottom). The drive, via Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, breaks on network tv June 14.

Cough medicine 'breakthrough'

Robins readies Extend for fall

By NANCY GIGES

A.H. Robins Co., the marketer of Robitussin cough/cold remedies, is now introducing one of the first new products for next fall's cold season—Extend 12, a time-release liquid based on a patent licensed from Pennwalt Corp.

The Richmond, Va., company plans a big fall debut for the cough medicine, a program that includes heavy tv and print advertising, plus couponing support.

Spot tv—in 85 markets—is to begin in October and continue through March. It will be at a "saturation" level during November and December, Robins sales material states. Print ads will run in American Health, Health, People, Reader's Digest, Saturday Evening Post and Woman's Day, as well as Sunday supplements.

According to a trade ad, Extend 12 advertising will reach 99% of all women 22 times during the introductory period. The advertising/promotion budget is not known. Last year, Robins invested close to $10 million in measured media to advertise Robitussin.

Popofsky Advertising, New York, handles both the Extend 12 and Robitussin lines.

Advertising is expected to emphasize that Extend 12 offers the convenience of fewer doses and longer relief than Richardson-Vicks' Vicks 44D, Dorsey Laboratories' Triaminic expectorant and Warner-Lambert's Benylin. Trade promotion calls the new product "a technological breakthrough. . .in a class by itself." Extend 12 also contains no alcohol, an ingredient in all of those other brands.

The active ingredient in Extend 12—dextromethorphan—is a popular cough suppressant, but no other products use a time-release system. This twice-daily dosage regimen for Extend 12 is an attribute that will make the product especially appealing to school-age children and working adults, the company contends.

John Burke, Robins' senior vp-general manager, consumer products, said the company expects to MIDDLEBURY, CONN.—Timex Computer will spend an estimated $12 million for the fourth-quarter promotion of its Timex Sinclair home computer line, including two new Series 2000 models being unveiled at the Consumer Electronics Show in Chicago. Priced at $150 and $200, the TS-2000 computers are aimed at an emerging "home productivity" market and reportedly deliver more memory than products priced as much as $1,200 higher. Budget for the upcoming campaign by JWT, New York, is up 50% over '82 and kicks off in October, with network and spot tv, national consumer and enthusiast magazines and newspapers.

Computer-ready homes are here

By RUTH STROUD

A quaint little town often billed in the tourist trade as "historic Benicia" is making history again.

The capital of California in the post-Gold Rush era, Benicia is the site of the first "computer-ready" community—houses built to accommodate computer hardware and permit residents to connect electronically with offices, banks, groceries or whatever services and commitments they left behind in the big city.

Each home in the 2,450-acre Southampton subdivision 32 miles north of San Francisco is equipped with a prewired family room and bedroom closet large enough to house a computer, printer and other accessories. Dwellings, which cost between $131,500 and $165,000, include dual phone lines so the user can send or receive information as well as talk on the telephone.

That's not all. Developer Southampton Co. of Menlo Park and partner First Nationwide Savings, San Francisco, will tack on an additional $3,500 to the mortgage price if the buyer is without a computer and wants the Apple IIe or IBM XT of his dreams. If the home buyer already owns the computer, he might spend the money on a printer and software.

"This has been the biggest innovation [in homes] in 20 years," Southampton advertising director Rod Herman said. "It will allow the home to function as a work place." It just doesn't make sense for some-

Sting hurts credibility, say newspapers

Bill making coupon fraud a crime being proposed

By NANCY GIGES and JENNIFER ALTER

The American Society for Industrial Security, which is spearheading a coupon fraud "sting" (AA, May 30), is pushing for federal legislation that would make coupon fraud itself a criminal act.

The proposed bill, called the Coupon Protection Act, goes further than any previous effort to control coupon misredemption, according to a couponing-industry veteran who has seen the draft legislation.

Meanwhile, controversy was building over the coupon sting, as the number of major newspapers discovered to have been used in the operation grew to at least six.

In an effort to trap coupon fraud perpetrators, coupon ads for a nonexistent shampoo called Essent were placed in those newspapers, apparently without their knowledge. Newspapers criticized the practice, saying it could undermine the credibility of advertising. Some grocery wholesalers and retailers also expressed strong disapproval.

Who's hurt in ad scam?
Editorial viewpoint on Page 16

The intent of the proposed Coupon Protection Act is to isolate coupon fraud in the law and make it easier to prosecute perpetrators, as well as to encourage law enforcement officials to recognize the seriousness of the crime.

At present, prosecutors trying to combat coupon fraud must rely on mail fraud, interstate theft or other statutes that don't specifically address coupon fraud, the redemption of manufacturers' coupons for cash by retailers who have not sold the product advertised or persons posing as retailers.

The draft legislation, which may represent the first effort to obtain federal legislation aimed specifically at the problem, defines coupon fraud and lists specific unlawful acts regarding the use, presentation or circulation of coupons. It also specifies penalties and jurisdictional procedures to be followed when state or local regulations might also apply.

ASIS, a 12,000-member, nonprofit association of industrial-security personnel based in Arlington, Va., wouldn't discuss the proposed bill. ADVERTISING AGE learned that the association's consumer fraud committee, chaired by Richard Reeves, manager of field investigations for Ralston Purina Co., has shown the seven-page draft to the Audit Bureau of Circulations, Newspaper Advertising Bureau, the Grocery Manufacturers of America, the Promotion Marketing Assn. of America and companies involved in couponing.

Lee Lloyd, redemption control manager for Scott Paper Co., and August Bequai, partner in the Washington law firm of Reed, Bequai, Ross & Burger, which represents ASIS, have called on associations seeking their support and suggestions. Messrs. Reeves, Lloyd and Bequai weren't available for comment.

As reported last week, Blair Marketing, a New York printer and distributor of advertising inserts that is cooperating with ASIS in the sting operation, last month placed a coupon ad for the fictitious shampoo in Sunday inserts and subsequent r.o.p. food sections of the New York Daily News and Chicago Tribune—without their knowledge, the newspapers say.

AD AGE has now confirmed that the fake ads also ran in the Chicago Sun-Times, Philadelphia Inquirer, Philadelphia Daily News and Newsday. A Blair Marketing spokesman had said earlier that the ads were placed only in the Tribune and New York Daily News.

Blair Marketing would not comment on the matter last week, referring all queries to an ASIS attorney who didn't return reporters' phone calls.

The use of the fake ads has raised questions about the propriety of the practice among newspapers. Asked if his paper would have run the ads had it known about them, Anthony Calianese, ad director for the New York Daily News, said, "Absolutely not."

Mr. Calianese continued, "The most valued asset any paper has is its readers. If we had accepted the ad, we would have really been involved in a reader hoax. A coupon hoax affects the integrity of our newspaper and advertiser confidence."

Thomas P. O'Donnell, exec vp-general manager of the Chicago Tribune, said that while he is "very sympathetic with the cause and why it was done," he objects to "preparing and running false advertising without informing the newspaper." He added, however: "Had Blair come to us, we probably would have done it."

Asked if that wasn't a contradiction in positions, Mr.

If anyone isn't aware of the Dutch origins of Grolsch beer, this unusual ad showing six-packs of Grolsch bursting from tulips and a windmill formed from a bottle should make the point clear. The ad was created by Warwick Advertising for Grolsch Importers, Atlanta (AA, May 30).

Atari pulls together

By BOB MARICH

Atari, in restructuring its operations, is belately acknowledging what industry analysts have maintained for more than a year: Videogames and home computers are merging into one market.

The troubled Warner Communications subsidiary is dropping its previously separate videogame (consumer electronics) and home computer divisions. In their place, a product development and marketing division, and a distribution division handling both games and computers, have been established (AA, May 30).

The revamp also sets the stage for a collective management structure that is expected gradually to end the one-man rule of chairman Raymond Kassar at the Sunnyvale, Cal., company. Mr. Kassar was the leading proponent of the separate-markets strategy.

The rivalry between executives of the separate computers and games divisions also is expected to diminish over time

Coke wine unit adds price line

By RUTH STROUD

Coca-Cola's Wine Spectrum will introduce Vivante, its first economy-price wine, in four eastern states this month, tackling a segment of the U.S. market it has not aimed at previously.

The wines, in screwtop 3 and 4-liter bottles, include chablis, burgundy, rhine and rosé. Vivante, priced possibly a notch above E&J Gallo Winery's Carlo Rossi brand, is being positioned through print ads and radio commercials as a "drinkable, good tasting wine people can be comfortable with." Ads are breaking on a market-by-market basis in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut and Maryland.

Wine Spectrum vp-marketing Tom Thompson said, "It's not the swirl-and-sniff crowd we're concerned with reaching. It's the people who drink wine any place, any time, for the pure enjoyment of it."

The introduction, Wine Spectrum's first since Taylor California Cellars appeared in 1978, is not an indication the company feels the premium wine drinking market has been saturated, Mr. Thompson said. "Taylor California Cellars has been doing superbly in the marketplace. We just want to grow at a

CBS, 3 sponsors near Chinese tv pact

Deal may lead to new co-production ventures

By MAURINE CHRISTOPHER

NEW YORK—CBS Broadcast International reportedly has three major companies on the verge of signing to co-sponsor a weekly hour of Chinese-dubbed CBS programing over China Central Television starting Oct. 7 (AA, May 30).

John Eger, vp-general manager of CBS International, has slotted the program to carry five minutes of advertising that will be sold to 10 participating U.S. sponsors for $300,000 each.

Odd-length spots will be accommodated. For that fee, marketers will receive 32 minutes of commercial time yearly and will be treated to an orientation trip to China to meet executives of CCTV, the state-owned network of the People's Republic of China.

Mr. Eger and his key aides—Arthur Kane, vp for international sales, and Charles Walsh, ad sales director—will arrange a three-day visit to Peking during the summer to give the international marketers a look at tv, China style. By then, the CBS executives would like to have a full house of sponsors lined up for their precedent-setting marketing invasion of China.

In the co-venture, CCTV will get 64 hours of its choice of sports, news, documentary and entertainment programing from the international catalog free in exchange for providing CBS with time. CBS and CCTV will share the $3 million in ad revenues during the year's test, which Mr. Eger hopes will lead to a long-term, mutually beneficial association.

Tv in China is in its pioneer era. There are only about 15 million to 16 million sets in use. When favorite shows, such as an English lesson, are on, people crowd around in homes and public places to watch as they did in America in the late 1940s. Sports, travel and news telecasts are popular.

CBS International's "hit list" for sales calls is the State Department's rundown of U.S. companies already doing business in China. Among the prospects: Stauffer Chemical, for agribusiness products; Coca-Cola Co., currently selling largely to foreign visitors to China; Fluor Corp., a construction company; International Business Machines, which provided the computers to count 2 billion-plus people during the last census, and oil companies such as Atlantic Richfield Co., British Petroleum and Occidental.

Presentations also will be directed to international agencies such as McCann-Erickson, J. Walter Thompson Co. and Compton Advertising.

While recognizing that China is not yet a consumer market, CBS will pitch the Friday night hour on CCTV for its potential three, four or five years hence. By then, brand names will have become a familiar part of the scene, if the aggressive, hard-driving capitalist marketers can establish a beachhead.

Whoever gets there first to use tv regularly to implant his brand name as the product to buy will have an advantage over the competition, Mr. Kane said. Commercials will have to be tailored carefully to avoid such pitfalls as unlucky colors. CBS will research the market to help guide advertisers in planning their campaigns.

Mr. Eger, who headed the White House Office of Telecommunications Policy in the Nixon administration, has been able to capitalize on the experience of those years. He was in the Nixon entourage for the historic trip that reestablished formal contact between the U.S. and China. The CBS-CCTV deal is the most dramatic accomplishment of an international division at Black Rock that is less than two years old.

Mr. Eger said the initial contract may pave the way for co-production ventures and for the distribution of CCTV programing in America and elsewhere. The first Chinese-produced show to be looked at as a possible export is "The Water Margin," an adventure show based on a popular historical novel and now being filmed.

When the delegation from CCTV comes to New York soon to select the 64 hours of CBS fare to be telecast from October to October, 1984, it might bring along an English-dubbed copy of the first episode of "Margin" for screening. Mr. Kane, who has seen some rushes, thinks this series may be a good bet for the U.S. market.

CBS International distributes its wares abroad in a variety of fashions, but mainly on the basis of national exclusivity for certain types of programs.

In the U.K., the British Broadcasting Corp., for example, buys tapes of most of the current public affairs and documentary programs, which range from "60 Minutes" to "Face the Nation."

Daily hard-news feeds are satellited to Japan and several other nations in the Pacific region. Nine Network in Australia buys this, made-for-tv movies and a current affairs package. Canada is one of the division's biggest sources of revenues. Canadian networks and stations buy live sports, made-for-tv flicks and other material from the catalog of 700 choices.#

- Young & Rubicam employes receive three weeks vacation after five years and four weeks after 10 years. The agency's vacation policy was incorrectly stated earlier (AA, May 23, P. 20). Y&R also notes that officers and department heads receive four weeks' vacation regardless of the number of years they have served at the agency.
- The Boston Phoenix was incorrectly identified as a Hayden Publishing Co. property (AA, May 30, P. 22). The weekly newspaper is independently owned and operated.
- Elite Models, New York, notes that the national finals of its "Look of the Year" model contest, staged in New York (AA, May 23, P. 61), is to be followed by the international finale in Acapulco in late November.

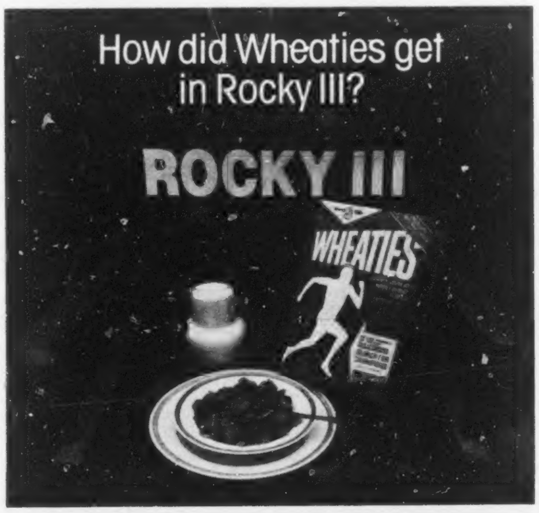
How did Wheaties get in Rocky III?



Associated Film Promotions makes the arrangements!

Today's smart advertiser—large or small—has to look beyond traditional media vehicles to increase awareness of his brand name products and services. Perhaps the most innovative and fastest growing medium is product placement in motion pictures.

The primary source to make these arrangements is Associated Film Promotions—AFP.

Associated Film Promotions not only placed the Wheaties in Rocky III and Poltergeist, we also placed the Budweiser in Tootsie! We placed the Milk Duds and Zagnut bars in 48 Hours, and we placed products in E.T. In fact, 7 of Hollywood's top 10 grossing films of 1982 contained our client's products. And so did 149 other films as well!

Associated Film Promotions places more products in more films than anyone because of our extensive personal contacts in the motion picture industry. We are asked by film production executives to assist in analyzing scripts for potential placement of products. We meet with studio staff members to determine the most effective way to use a client's product. And our executives go on location to ensure products appear to their best advantage.

Products that Associated Film Promotions place can reach a theater audience of over 50 million, with additional millions of impressions from tv, cable, airline and foreign distribution. With that kind of impact, this powerful source of visibility should be seriously considered by every advertiser. Especially since Associated Film Promotions guarantees placement of the client's product.

We can also arrange additional product exposure using a wide range of promotional tie-ins with the films in which a client's product or service appears.

Associated Film Promotions is the acknowledged leader in representing corporate America to the motion picture industry. Our offices are located in Century City (LA) and New York City.

By JOHN A. MAXWELL JR.

Cold cereal volume in 1982 was up 1% to 1.5%, to about 2.05 billion pounds. The year's dollar volume grew about 10% and probably approached $3.3 billion.

The current 2%-to-3% tonnage growth trend is a possibility for this year, and price increases of around 6% are expected. The only companies that gained market share in 1982 were General Foods' Post division, Quaker Oats and General Mills.

Both Quaker and Post were up 6% in units. General Mills was up 2% to 3% in units, while Ralston Purina was down 7% to 8% with its branded products. Kellogg was off around 1% in poundage.

While Kellogg continued to lose share over-all, some of its new products, such as Nutri-Grain and Marshmallow Krispies, provided good volume growth. General Mills' growth was led mainly by new products, such as Strawberry Shortcake and Donutz, while most of its other products were relatively stable.

General Foods had the biggest share gains of the industry; it seems to have had excellent success with its Fruit & Fibre, accompanied by good success of Raisin Grape Nuts and Honey Nut Crunch. In the case of Quaker, Life and 100% Natural provided the main upticks.

An examination of what happened to production shows that the principal growth appears to be in the "health area," and it is expected to continue to be the area of major growth.

Additionally, a lot more new products are expected this year; Pac-Man and Donkey Kong already are being introduced. Kellogg has indicated that it will attempt to regain its former market share position of 40%-plus, indicating that more promotions and introductions are forthcoming.#

Competitors playing catch-up to McDonald's

Breakfast hot in fast-food

By SCOTT HUME

When McDonald's first tested the Egg McMuffin in 1973, its competitors were skeptical. Conventional wisdom held that you couldn't convince consumers to eat breakfast at a fast-food restaurant.

When the McMuffin was rolled out systemwide in 1977, the competition still was unconvinced breakfast was a daypart with a future. The mid-'70s were strong years for the fast-food industry, and most chains felt little pressure to follow McDonald's lead.

Several things have changed since then. Industry growth is flat and competition has increased as the market has become more crowded.

Breakfast, however, according to most estimates, contributes 15% of the average McDonald's unit's sales and an even larger share of its profits. And the question competitors now are asking isn't why they should add breakfast but how.

Wendy's International, for example, just launched its first full-market tv campaign for breakfast in Columbus, O., one of the markets in which it is continuing its test of a breakfast sandwich, french toast and omelets. The menu will be introduced in additional markets throughout the year, and new national advertising is flexible enough to include breakfast support.

According to the CREST (Consumer Research on Eating Share Trends) Report prepared by GDR/CREST Enterprises, Rosemont, Ill., breakfast has been the industry's best performer over the past few years. Between 1978 and 1982, breakfast sales at all restaurant segments rose 53%, and customer counts were up 32%. Total industry sales over the same period increased 34%; total customer traffic dipped 3%.

Given those figures, one industry analyst explains that "the temptation to offer breakfast is too great not to do it."

Breakfast offers a potentially profitable use for facilities during unutilized morning hours and appeals almost entirely to the adult market that demographics say is where fast-food's future lies. But it also means a tough market fight not only with fast-food chains but with coffee-shops (for which breakfast always has been the strongest daypart). As everyone who has tested the water agrees, breakfast could be fast-food's greatest marketing challenge.

McDonald's proved breakfast is viable, but, explains Larry Krueger, vp-marketing for Atlanta-based Arby's, which has been testing breakfast, "it took them several years and several million dollars in advertising support to do it. We don't have that kind of time or money."

McDonald's and the other breakfast pioneer, Rocky Mount, N.C.-based Hardee's, have succeeded with breakfast not only because they were the first to offer it but also because they have made the hefty commitment of marketing dollars necessary to keep it going.

"A lot of chains are trying to add breakfast as a secondary meal," said Karl Martinez, vp-marketing for Columbus, O.-based Rax Restaurants. "But you have to make the long-term commitment to full-year marketing support and increased labor costs for it to succeed."

In addition to being labor-intensive, especially if the breakfast buffet or bar is used (which the Shoney's Big Boy chain has pioneered in the Southeast), breakfast often means addition of a new equipment package.

About 1,000 Burger Kings have added breakfast items and discovered that while broiling may beat frying when it comes to hamburgers, it's hard to broil scrambled eggs. Grills have to be added, which means capital expenditures franchisees are reluctant to make unless they're sure of a return. And 15% of sales is not enough of a return to convince some operators breakfast is worthwhile.

"Another problem with breakfast is that it's awfully hard to provide real product differentiation," said Arby's vp-marketing Larry Krueger. "It's difficult to create the niche or brand item like a Whopper that you can with sandwiches. It's hard to be unique with scrambled eggs."

Whataburger, based in Corpus Christi, Tex., has tried. Its Taquito breakfast item is scrambled eggs and sausage rolled in a tortilla.

With chains forced to offer a basic variety of foods consumers expect in the morning, such as scrambled eggs or biscuits, attracting customers quickly reduces itself to location and price. "And that," Mr. Krueger points out, "is when competition gets cutthroat."

Even when the product and price are right, breakfast just won't go in every location. Urban stores almost have to offer it now to be competitive, but even that can differ by geographical region.

Arby's is considering adding a morning menu, said Mr. Krueger, on a "store-by-store and market-by-market basis," with some units offering biscuits, others croissants.

Wendy's, too, is considering regional variations, with croissants replacing biscuits in the Northeast and breakfast pastries offered in western states.

Hardee's biscuit breakfast has been a success in the chain's primary Southeastern markets and will be in all of its units by December. But David Guckenberg, president of North Central Food Systems, Minneapolis, a Hardee's franchise for the upper Midwest, admits that, although his breakfast sales have begun to pick up, he's "not getting his money's worth."#

Network pitches pull at heartstrings

By DIANE MERMIGAS

The three major tv networks will rely on emotion-evoking elements this summer and fall to lure viewers for their prime time fall season.

ABC, NBC and CBS have all developed new strategies for their on-air promotions. The generic campaigns debut later this month; spots for individual new and returning series begin in August. The 1983-84 prime time season is expected to begin the final week in September.

However, the network promotion departments, each spending about $1 million, have about seven minutes less of weekly prime time program breaks in which to peddle their wares this year, because of the recent commercial-inventory expansion.

The most radical promotional shift this season is at ABC, which in recent years has taken a glossy, star-studded, parading-in-the-streets approach to touting its programs and inviting viewer sampling. The No. 2 network will be selling more homespun and heart when it kicks off its "That special feeling" campaign.

"It's a repositioning campaign. We're trying to get the audience to see us as being sensitive and mature and possessing basic, wholesome values," said Roy Polevoy, vp of on-air promotion for ABC Entertainment. "My guess would be that viewers may not see us or any network as that now. That's why we decided not to make a big splash, but to take a more dignified, low-key approach."

Mr. Polevoy said the decision to humanize and broaden the appeal of network promotions was grounded in the "gut feeling" of executives. Also, ABC's viewer demographics are shifting away from the younger viewers that have been ABC's mainstay.

Some ABC officials have suggested the new campaign reflects the more meat-and-potatoes management style of Fred Pierce, who recently succeeded Elton Rule as vice-chairman of the American Broadcasting Cos.

If the new ABC spots seem reminiscent of Kodak and Pepsi-Cola's tug-at-your-heart commercials, it's because all three campaigns are the work of director Rick Levine.

Down on the farm, a boy finds a puppy he brings home snuggled under his zipper jacket. Vicks covers field with vitamin rollout

By PAT SLOAN

Richardson-Vicks will introduce Lifestage vitamins, a six-formula line, in August with $11.5 million in advertising and promotional support.

According to retail sources, almost $9 million will be spent on network tv, with the remaining $2.5 million going to promotion.

There were indications earlier this year that the introduction was imminent (AA, Feb. 21).

Lifestage is not R-V's first entry into the $2.3 billion vitamin market, but it does represent its first crack at the drugstore/supermarket multivitamin business. Its Plus Products subsidiary sells Plus vitamin and mineral food supplements via healthfood stores.

Each Lifestage formula is aimed at a specific segment of the multivitamin market and, in some cases, a specific competitor. For example, children's formula Lifestage will compete with Miles Laboratories' Flintstones; teens' with multivitamins in general; adult women's with Miles' One-A-Day, and adult men's with Squibb's Theragram M and Centrum.

In addition, both the men's and women's stress formulas will take on the various stress vitamins, such as Lederle Labs' Stresstabs.

Perhaps to capitalize on the healthcare franchise built upon the Vicks name, the Lifestage name is preceded by Vicks on the packaging. The package has a photo of an appropriate-aged customer for each formula.

An obvious obstacle to selling stores on so many formulas under one name is the question of tight shelf space. And it appears Richardson-Vicks has thought of that. Said an R-V spokesman: "The packaging is vertical [taller than it is wide] so it takes up approximately the same space as 2.5 or three facings of the market leaders, which use horizontal packaging [wider than it is tall]."

In its sales materials to the trade, R-V stresses this point with the explanation, "All six Lifestage formulas take up less valuable shelf space than two of most leading brands' packages." Centrum and One-A-Day are shown.

Retail buyers, who usually are skeptical of new entries because of the extremely competitive and fragmented nature of the vitamin mar-

L&M back with cigaret brand tests

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

Propelled by the success of its generic cigarets, a gritty Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co. is heading into a full-blown test of two branded cigarets—L&M Superior and Dorado.

Hal Grant, Liggett & Myers vp-sales and marketing, was exuberant during a telephone interview as he spoke of the test marketing of L&M Superior in Brownsville, Tex., and Dorado in Albuquerque, N.M., beginning next month.

"We're very committed to the branded end of the business, and we're very confident going back into it," he said. "But we're not going to compete stick-for-stick with the big guys. That would be a suicide approach. We see our opportunities in the way the market is being segmented."

That segmentation approach is apparent in the new test cigarets, whose mission is to appeal to both "Anglos and Hispanics," as Mr. Grant put it. "Hispanics are very much mainstream. If a cigaret looks as though it's pointed directly at them, they won't accept it." If either brand goes, the L&M executive thinks there is plenty of business to be had in the nine states that account for 90% of the Hispanic population in the U.S.

Group W sets sports net

By SUSAN SPILLMAN

HOUSTON—Group W Satellite Entertainment Communications will announce at the National Cable Television Assn. convention here this week details of a new national cable tv sports network.

The network's initial markets, Chicago, Milwaukee and Seattle, will launch this fall, followed by Baltimore/Washington and Detroit next spring.

Baseball will serve as the network's cornerstone. Group W already has signed deals with the Baltimore Orioles, Chicago White Sox, Detroit Tigers, Milwaukee Brewers and Seattle Mariners and hopes to land the rights to other professional and collegiate sports.

Each market will carry the games played by its home team. These regional games, however, will share a "national programing wrap" that includes updated sports scores, sports documentaries, game highlights, features and national commercials. The "national wrap" will be beamed to the markets at different times, filling channels where no home-team games are being played.

The service, being compared to the regional/national format of "PM Magazine," will air 16 hours per day and require the use of Group W's four satellite transponders on Hughes' Galaxy satellite. It will be fed from the company's Stamford, Conn., headquarters, also home of Group W's Satellite News Channel operation.

Revenue will be sought from a combination of subscriber fees and

Nabisco's Parkson folding into Ohlmeyer

House shop handles over $60 million

By GAY JERVEY

New York—Nabisco Brands will quietly disband its in-house Parkson Advertising agency in the coming months and fold its operations under the umbrella of Don Ohlmeyer Communications, the year-old joint venture between Nabisco and sports and special-programing producer Don Ohlmeyer.

Nabisco executives could not be reached for comment, but Parkson president-chief executive officer Philip Agisim said he could "neither confirm nor deny the report, because there are just too many sensitive things involved."

However, Advertising Age has learned that the impending reorganization involves at least one key personnel appointment, Phil Howort, who later this summer will join Ohlmeyer Communications as exec vp.

His first task, sources say, will be to oversee the Parkson dismantling and absorption into the Ohlmeyer stable. At press time, Mr. Ohlmeyer could not be reached for comment on Parkson's future, but earlier in the week he confirmed Mr. Howort's appointment, citing particularly his versatility and agency and package goods background.

Most recently, Mr. Howort has been based in Los Angeles as senior vp, Comworld International, a syndication company. Prior to that, he was an agent with the Creative Artists Agency. Earlier, he worked at McCann-Erickson, currently Nabisco's agency for cereals and Dromedary products.

Nabisco became a 50% partner in Ohlmeyer Communications last spring. Mr. Ohlmeyer terms the arrangement as synergistic in that although his company remains independent in much of its programing forays, Nabisco has ready access to Ohlmeyer's programing and software expertise.

"We will ultimately do programing and packaging for them," he said. "Our mandate is to keep Nabisco on the cutting edge of the new technologies, which have tremendous ramifications for a major consumer company such as Nabisco. . .So, in a very controlled way, it is getting its feet wet with software, examining opportunities in cable, programing and so forth.

"Basically the food industry is a maturing business, growing at a fairly predictable rate," he continued. Thus, he explained, Nabisco wants to keep its eyes open for alluring avenues of profit and opportunity; to remain poised for growth.

Despite repeated Nabisco denials, Parkson's future has long been rumored to be a tentative one. Nabisco acquired the agency in 1971 with the purchase of J.B. Williams Co. Until Nabisco sold J.B. Williams to the London-based Beecham Group last year, Parkson handled creative for Williams' toiletries and pharmaceuticals divisions, which to-

Penney puts new image into Halston hands

By PAT SLOAN

New York—When Norton Simon Inc. acquired the Halston business 10 years ago, the name had only a 17.4% awareness among consumers.

In a successful bid for national recognition of the designer name, NSI won Halston the right to design for the 1976 U.S. Olympic team and staged a limited tie-in with the Montgomery Ward catalog.

Last week, Halston premiered a comprehensive fashion collection in 21 cities for another mass merchandiser—one trying to upgrade its image, J.C. Penney Co. Penney is making Halston the biggest marketing effort in its history, larger even than its late-1970s push of the J.C. Penney battery against Sears' Die-Hard, which indicates just how far it has come in according top priority to fashion.

The Halston name now stands as the leading designer moniker in recognition and believability, according to Penney research, although other retailers rank Gloria Vanderbilt higher.

But by the end of this year, after Penney has run

JWT asks court to drop Luisi suit

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

New York—Attorneys for JWT Group have set out to debunk and dismiss the claim that the agency "unlawfully dismissed" Marie Luisi, former senior vp and head of JWT's syndication and spot-buying unit, and to demonstrate that Ms. Luisi's $125.3 million damage suit against the company has no legal basis.

The agency filed a 47-page motion in New York state supreme court to seek dismissal of the suit that was brought by Ms. Luisi in late March. Ms. Luisi was dismissed in 1982 after JWT announced it had uncovered "fictitious entries" and "accounting irregularities" to the tune of $30 million in the unit Ms. Luisi headed.

Ms. Luisi's attorneys, Ivan Fisher and Tom Puccio, have until the end of the month to respond to JWT's motion. No one will estimate when a judge will rule on the JWT motion, or when the case might reach trial.

In Ms. Luisi's complaint (AA, April 18), she accused the agency and five top Thompson executives of defamation of character and reputation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, of a general lack of financial controls, of participating in a coverup designed to "save their own jobs" and of causing her to suffer severe economic loss. She named as defendants Don Johnston, chairman, JWT Group; Herbert Eames, exec vp-chief financial officer, JWT Group; Burt Manning, chairman, J. Walter Thompson USA; Victor Gutierrez, senior vp-treasurer, and Robert Buchanan, exec vp, J. Walter Thompson USA.

JWT, following its internal investigation of Ms. Luisi's unit, wrote off $30 million in pretax earnings and restated its revenues for the years 1978-1981. (Last week, the company made an offering of 585,000 shares, for a net of

P&G exits Y&R over Olay soap

By JENNIFER ALTER

The July national introduction of Olay beauty soap by Richardson-Vicks apparently triggered Procter & Gamble's decision to scratch Young & Rubicam from its domestic agency list.

And its handling of the new product (AA, April 11)—an assignment that violates P&G's conflict policy—has cost it P&G business overseas as well.

P&G, which had approximately $13 million worth of domestic business at Y&R, last week reassigned Dash detergent to Benton & Bowles; Spic & Span to Wells, Rich, Greene; Ariel detergent to Tatham-Laird & Kudner, and Brigade automatic toilet-bowl cleaner to Dancer Fitzgerald Sample. (The latter two are test brands.) At the same time, it moved White Cloud toilet tissue to Leo Burnett USA from DFS.

Although Y&R remains one of P&G's top agencies outside the U.S., handling more than 20 brands in 25 countries, it also lost Zest to Burnett in the United Kingdom, France and Italy; Mon Savon to Compton in Belgium, and Escudo (Safeguard) to Grey in Mexico. The company is "review-

International ad budgets top expectations

By VALERIE MACKIE

U.S. advertising agencies, which had been aiming for a strong year internationally, are finding that ad budgets in Europe are increasing even faster than they anticipated, and this is giving over-all international results an unexpected bit of bounce.

Agency executives were predicting a slow first half internationally, with a solid second-half recovery and a strong year over-all (AA, Jan. 24). Instead, when agencies review their first-half results this month, they will find that advertisers marginally increased their ad budgets in Europe, which is the main source of international revenues for most agencies.

Jerry Roberts, senior vp-international at Young & Rubicam, says, "We came off a tentative 1982 and went into the beginning of 1983 with expectations that it would be flat during the first quarter and progress from there. In fact, what we are seeing is a substantially stronger first quarter than we were prepared for."

The key "engine" behind this strong European showing for many agencies appears to be France, where ad spending jumped about 3% in real terms during the first quarter compared with year-earlier figures for the same period. Industry projections for 1983 were running at about 1% in January.

Doyle Dane Bernbach reports real growth in France during the first quarter of about 30%. Michel Richardot, chairman of the Ogilvy & Mather group in France, says, "U.S. multinational companies are maintaining confidence in the French market and continuing to invest—helped now by recent government measures to deal with France's balance of payments problem."

In other European countries, ad expenditures during the first half of the year are increasing in line with the forecasts. In the U.K., the 5% projection for 1983 is holding up, despite some feeling by D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius that the forecast was too optimistic. "The optimists have so far proved correct," concedes Andrew Roberts, executive director of media research for D'Arcy in London.

Ad spending growth in Germany remains fairly flat, as predicted, but some agencies note a slight increase in billings due to new-product introductions. Willi Schalk, exec vp of BBDO International, says, "The clients' mood is better, and major new-product development with ad outlays to match are in sight. Many clients are assuming the U.S. and European markets will recover in the second half of this year."

Not all ad agencies are affected equally by the good news. Usually an agency's largest share of international billings comes from Europe, but in some cases it does not. For example, BBDO International might not share as much as other multinational agencies in the general first-half upturn because it is stronger in Australia and South Africa, markets that have not recovered as rapidly as Europe.

Interpublic Group of Cos., coming off a tough first quarter, is still looking for its biggest recovery in the second half. Philip Geier Jr., chief executive officer of Interpublic, says, "We are seeing a resurgence in the U.S., and it takes six months for the rest of the world to catch up."

For example, McCann-Erickson, which comes off its best year in Latin America with 50% real growth in 1982, continued to increase its billings more than 25% in the first quarter of 1983. "It will be difficult to reach that [growth] in the next quarter because inflation is up every month," says Jens Olesen, McCann's regional director for South America.

J. Walter Thompson Co., which had been looking for 15% to 16% real growth this year outside the U.S., now is aiming for 15% to 20% growth. "All our core offices, Canada, U.K., Germany, Italy, are doing very well," Don Deaton, JWT senior vp-financial communications, says. "Mexico, Venezuela and Argentina are down, but by no means can be considered a disaster."

Offsetting some of the strong results in Europe for many agencies is a slower-than-expected pace in Latin America.

But the disaster spotlight has shifted from Mexico, where estimated ad spending has dropped 10% more than the projected 30% dip for 1983, to Venezuela, where spending figures drastically were revised from an earlier estimated 8% to 10% increase to an anticipated 40% plunge.

One agency executive said comparing Venezuela and Mexico was like comparing a black hole and a swamp.

Venezuela has been victimized by the slowdown in the oil market, as well as by the sudden imposition of price and exchange rate controls, severe cutbacks on imports and an inflation rate that has soared from 8% to a current rate of nearly 30%.

Jose Sarmiento, ad manager for top-ranked tv channel Venevision, says ad revenues fell 25% in April alone, and that ads for high-priced items like stereos, tvs, automobiles and computers are becoming rare.

Some of Venezuela's ad agencies laid off 40% of their employes in February, according to sources. The government is looking at moves to ease the crisis, and "everything will depend on the next 60 days," says Bill Peninche, president of JWT de Venezuela, the leading U.S. agency here.

Mexican advertisers face the identical problem as in Venezuela: Price controls and soaring inflation. Nestle cut its media ad spending from $830,000 in the first four months of 1982 to $620,000 for the same period this year. Sources say ad agencies rapidly are moving to fees instead of commissions, and that smaller ad "boutiques" offering discounted services are on the rise.

Brazil also appears to have lost ground, with ad spending expected to remain flat in 1983 instead of the anticipated 5% increase. Clients had hoped for inflation to run around 85%, but now are planning for 130% to 150%, sources there say.

In Australia, where businesses just faced their worst quarter in 14 years, ad spending is coming in slightly lower than the predicted 5% growth for 1983. South Africa looks uncertain as well. While most forecasts for 1983 still hover around a 4.5% to 5% increase, so far ad spending in the first half of 1983 has been subdued because the severe drought has slowed economic recovery. No advertisers have announced major cutbacks, however.

But the biggest question mark may well be Canada, which, traditionally, has always lagged four to six months behind economic movements in the U.S. Now the gap may have widened, leaving some doubt about whether the previously projected 1% real growth in ad expenditures will happen.

The takeoff in spending is coming in Canada, "but it's not going to be a big, fast train," says Ron Kovas, president of J. Walter Thompson Canada.#

The medium is potent, if the message is clear

By Joanne Cleaver

Intuition may finally have found its niche.

Though numbers and statistics will always be important in making media buys and developing creative strategies, they don't go far toward rounding out the feel and direction of a particular advertising campaign. But with cable, that "gut feeling" that surreptitiously shapes most campaigns anyway may come into its own.

Curiously, it's cable's potential for targeting audiences specifically that may turn the usual media strategy process inside out. Though the final tally won't be in for several years, even the research to date confirms the cable industry's claims that its audience is young, upscale, affluent—the "trendsetters," as one advertising executive says.

Cable viewers are emerging as demanding, sophisticated consumers: If an ad jars them or seems out of tune with the programing on the network, they're even more likely than a broadcast viewer to flip the switch or "zap out" the commercial.

"People do tend to home in on the channel most interesting to them," points out Robert Alter, president of the Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau. "Advertisers are looking to cable for longer commercials, those that do fit the environment, whether for rock or a women's environment. There's a trend away from the 30-second, slice-of-life, get-in-and-get-out approach."

If slice-of-life is stale, what is the fresh new recipe for cable? Improvisation and imagination, say executives who've been flirting with the medium.

> "Cable has to have a different tone. The audience is much more selective. You have to give them something to keep you tuned. You have to go back to the basics of selling."

"If we can assume the audience is interested, and if the client is power tools on a 'fix-it' show, then we can assume that people watching the show use and are into power tools. Does that mean I can afford to be wild, or cut it and go with straight talk?" asks Allen Rosenshine, chairman and chief executive officer of BBDO, New York.

Adds Lois Ernst, president of Advertising to Women, New York: "Cable has to have a different tone. The audience is much more selective. You have to give them something to keep you tuned. There's no way you can be insulting, asinine, bombastic; there's no toleration of that. You have to go back to the basics of selling—that is, make yourself welcome and then offer them something."

Traditional mass approaches to advertising are "writing for the world, which is writing for no one. It [cable] has to be personal, like you're phoning someone," explains Ms. Ernst, an outspoken proponent of cable's creative potential.

In other words, it would be fair to assume that cable viewers are expecting a little more, say agency executives. After all, they're paying even for the basic service. Cable network executives are determined not to repeat the mistakes of their broadcast brethren; they're quite aware that their subscribers are more affluent, and they say they're striving to attract and hold them through quality programing.

Advertisers who began exploring cable's potential before last winter's revelations about declining network audiences have a head start on understanding the flexibility and drawbacks of the medium. They point to programing as both its curse and its saving grace.

Notes Robert High, vp-management supervisor with Marsteller Inc., New York, "People are interested in programing, not networks." In working on the consumer marketing strategy for the USA Cable Network, Mr. High has come to the conclusion that networks with a very specific programing niche—USA's four daypart segments, for instance—will successfully attract advertiser support.

But because there still isn't enough advertising for the cable networks to be self-supporting, they're having problems financing quality programing, even though they say it's a top priority. Still, advertisers who are seeking a specific niche usually don't have to look too hard to find it.

Kraft Inc. was one of the first advertisers to approach tv 40 years ago by sponsoring a specific personality's show. It fits right into the corporate tradition to sponsor cable shows.

"We've tried everything," says James Blocki, vp and director-advertising and marketing services. "We've done a variety of offers. We've been a participating sponsor, we've run both kinds of commercials [standard and infomercials]. But we haven't come to any conclusions" about the creative advantages or even the ultimate effectiveness of cable.

Kraft has expanded its traditional service orientation on its cable spots. The company has often run 30-second broadcast commercials that refer the viewer to a corresponding ad in TV Guide to take advantage of a specific recipe or offer. When Kraft expanded that basic concept on a 90-second cable spot and ran the offer on the screen, it was overwhelmed with 12,000 responses. But the same offer made in the middle of a 30-minute Kraft-sponsored cooking show was a dud.

Though Kraft hasn't solidified a specific cable strategy, Mr. Blocki says the medium is looking attractive because the company has excluded itself from many violent, sexually explicit broadcast tv programs.

Viewers' matter-of-fact acceptance of Kraft's infomercials is the kind of response that most advertisers could nurture through dovetailing commercials with cable programing, say industry insiders.

The more closely integrated a network's ads and programs are, the more automatic acceptance and credibility both segments will have with viewers. And when both demographic and psychographic information is available about an audience, advertisers can tune in to a particular audience from different angles.

BBDO's Arnold Semsky, director-media and programing services, points to a "Motor Week Illustrated" video magazine that was sponsored by Dodge. Firestone also produced a special commercial for the show. "That was a life style thing," notes Mr. Semsky. Demographics indicated that young men who like to work on cars also like to drink beer; consequently Old Milwaukee also ran ads.

"People have different expectations [from cable advertising]," says Ron Kaatz, senior vp and director-media resources and research at J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago. "The main objective of the 30-second, $70,000 commercial is to attract attention and deliver one sales pitch. Cable saves money and delivers the message without the glitz. The one-to-10-minute ads on Cableshop cost $1,000 to $1,500 in production each minute. They provide helpful information."

Such a service approach is appropriate for many women's programs. But on MTV:Music Television, which is basically popular music video aired and geared toward teens and young adults, a three-second commercial might be most appropriate, suggests another agency executive. It all depends on the style of the particular station.

While advertisers struggle to pinpoint demographics and psychographics of cable viewers, these factors are changing—sometimes because of the very presence of cable in the home.

The first cable subscribers were usually in rural areas and the initial service was intended as a collective antenna for regions with poor reception. Today's new subscribers are a "whole different breed of viewer," says Hazel Kahan, vp-research at Warner Amex Cable in New York.

"Video recorders, Walkmans, phone answering machines, personal computers, they all allow the individual to transcend space and time," she says. "You can see something wherever and

Research clarifies programing reception

By Joanne Cleaver

The timing couldn't have been better. Just when the broadcast networks were embarrassed by the drop in market share revealed through routine research, the cable networks proudly unveiled the results of their first market studies.

The contrast underscores the growing distance between tv's two universes—cable and broadcast. It also gives many agencies just the incentive—or excuse—they need to edge into cable.

The Cable Audience Methodology Study (CAMS), sponsored by the Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau, was perhaps the most eagerly awaited study. But many people who expected hard numbers and statistics were disappointed with it.

"The ad community was confused and disappointed that it [CAMS] isn't the Holy Grail," says Hazal Kahan, vp-research at Warner Amex Cable in New York. "There isn't one answer. I don't think people understood what it was designed to do, which was to take six different methodologies and compare them to the truth. Media researchers understood that. I don't know what the rest of the world thought."

Robert Alter, president of the Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau, points out that CAMS mainly confirms cable researchers' suspicions that traditional methods of measuring audiences tend to seriously underreport cable viewers. While telephone coincidentals proved again to be the most accurate method, diaries and aided recall also showed some promise, explains Mr. Alter.

But as technology outstrips research methods, even traditional methods yield confusing results. For example, the percentage of U.S. adults with cable in their household ranges from 30% to 41%, depending on the source. While the rate of growth is slowing somewhat, new subscribers are not in metropolitan areas, and choosing cable for its programing variety, not merely to enhance reception, say researchers.

Meanwhile, several cable networks are gaining large enough audiences to be included in both A.C. Nielson Co. and Arbitron Ratings Co.'s regular ongoing surveys.

"We want research, but quantitative research isn't difficult. The real opportunities lie in psychographic and qualitative research, attitudes, attention levels, recall, how people watch tv, not how many."

Many agencies say that even the amount of research that's already come out is enough to start with. The juxtaposition of cable and network research results last February was enough to justify cable buys simply on the grounds of making up for broadcast's reduced reach.

Observes Jeff LaWenda, vp-advertising sales and development at the USA Network: "Many advertisers know that there's a light at the end of the tunnel. We want research, but quantitative research isn't difficult. The real opportunities lie in psychographic and qualitative whenever you want. You can electronically do it yourself."

Ms. Kahan has labeled this hard-to-hit target the "New Electronic Media Individual," or NEMI, as she terms it. Instead of bending their schedules to catch a particular show, NEMIs manipulate their arsenal of electronic receivers to fit their own schedules.

"They're no longer controlled by the medium," she says. "They have more power and they're more self-respecting. It's a higher level of person, and advertisers had better learn to speak to this person. They can reject you. You can't afford to not understand how these people behave."

Walter Reichel, executive vp and director-media programs at Ted Bates Advertising/New York, says "a new audience is being created. They're above average consumers for almost any product.

"It isn't just that they're tuning in to pay [tv] and watching less network, but they probably also have vcrs, are willing to experiment with interactive [tv] and have computer capability."

If cable technology is the catalyst for the emergence of a new breed of viewers, it's also the magnet for a new breed of advertisers.

While agency executives say it's unlikely that liquor, cigarets or other controversial products not currently on the airwaves will find a niche in cable, they do say that many clients with specialized markets are shifting their attention—and money—to cable.

"Products that couldn't [previously] afford it will be getting national exposure—products that are using magazines, not television—today," Mr. Kaatz predicts. "Something medically oriented might use the Cable Health Network. A company that makes barometers would use the weather channels."

The one great untapped market, which will remain untapped for several years to come, is local advertising.

Cable networks have so far focused their energies on getting subscribers and major advertisers; very few have gone after the likes of local grocery chains and hardware stores. Says Mr. Kaatz, "The dam has yet to burst on local ads. When it comes, the growth will be much greater than anyone expected. A lot of local advertisers would love to use television, but it's terribly expensive. [Cable] gives them the opportunity to give an extended message."

J. Walter Thompson recently experimented with a week-long cable workshop for local car dealers. Using the Lansing, Mich., cable system, the dealers learned how to develop a local cable advertising plan and produce high quality, low budget cable commercials and programs.

This project could be a prototype for other local advertiser cooperation with cable operators, notes Mr. Kaatz.

With such experimenting going on, why are many clients and agencies just plunking their standard 30-second broadcast commercials into the specialized cable environment? Though this "strategy" might work for a while, it doesn't take advantage of the possibilities that cable offers.

The root of the problem isn't in a lack of creative desire or will, but in a lack of time and money. When the broadcast networks simultaneously raised their rates and then revealed that their market was shrinking, especially among young affluent adults, clients and agencies stampeded the cable networks to make up for the underreach.

"There are basically two strategies in cable today," observes Ted Bates' Mr. Reichel. "There's a defensive side, which will still be the most important until the cable network audiences build. The opportunistic side looks at the special audiences of cable, and for certain clients that's a very good fit."

research, attitudes, attention levels, recall, how people watch tv, not how many. That's the missing link."

One company that's trying to forge that link is Television Audience Assessments (TAA), Cambridge, Mass.

TAA's president, Elizabeth Roberts, says that the first results of her company's attempts to measure audience response in terms of "impact" and "appeal" of programs indicate that cable is shaking up the way people watch tv.

The study used a specially designed diary form that participants mailed in within 48 hours of each day that was reported. Ms. Roberts says the method has an error rate of 3%. Telephone coincidentals were used to confirm viewing patterns and behavior.

She says the mere presence of cable in a locale influences viewer's habits.

"The more channels, the less loyalty," she says. "Cable has eroded viewer loyalty in general. All programs will have to work harder to get them back. This data will tell operators which programs will bring them back."

Advertisers have a vested interest in finding out how involved viewers are with programing, especially as related to narrowly targeted cable stations, she says. TAA data indicate that the more attuned viewers are to the programing, the more receptive they'll be to the advertising.

Despite the continuing efforts of researchers to pinpoint cable's reception, at least one advertising executive says he has had enough already.

"There's too much research on cable to digest," complains Arnold Semsky, executive vp-director of media and program services with BBDO, New York. "Research is important, but judgment and experience are more important. You shouldn't use it as a crutch. You should have some courage to go ahead even if the numbers aren't always there and aren't always meaningful."

'Made-for-pay' signals new cable directions

By Udayan Gupta

Not too long ago, an independent film maker, desperately attempting to sell some films to cable, complained about how safe and conservative pay cable really was. There was very little original programing, she pointed out, and all the cable networks ended up showing the same material—movies from the Variety money charts, movies with proven box office clout.

Bernadette Peters gets a wake-up kiss on Showtime's "Sleeping Beauty."

Recently, however, pay cable has been desperately attempting to correct this image of itself as a clone of commercial tv. Both Home Box Office (HBO) and Showtime are serving up a variety of programing produced for pay—programing that is refreshingly different from that seen on the three networks. Just a few weeks ago, even Cinemax—the poor cousin of HBO—got into the act when it picked up the comedy series "SCTV," which had been dropped by NBC because of its $400,000 per show price tag.

The programing direction taken by the pay networks is no fleeting phenomenon. Both HBO and Showtime executives argue that their original programs have struck a positive chord in their audiences, and they plan to stick with the strategy. "We have demonstrated with the shows in the past that our audience is more than satisfied," argues Bridget Potter, vp-original programing at HBO, adding that the pay network plans to do even more of what it has been doing so successfully.

Ms. Potter contends that original programing for HBO is nothing new. It has been programing concerts and boxing specials for years. True, but the made-for-pay films and dramatic series that HBO now offers clearly indicate a new direction. Even last year, series such as "Philip Marlowe*—Private Eye" and "Not Necessarily the News" may have had a rough time selling HBO's programers. Even Showtime seems determined to move away from its image as a presenter of Broadway show tapes. The continuing "Faerie Tales Theatre" and the revival of the erstwhile network tv show "Paper Chase" provides proof of this determination.

Tv stars Gregory Harrison, Cheryl Ladd and Perry King are the leads in "The Hasty Heart" on Showtime.

Pay tv's rush to original programing isn't a case of instant esthetics. HBO's Ms. Potter is emphatic in saying that HBO isn't a cultural network and has no interest in presenting Samuel Beckett's plays or Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." The attraction for programing for pay seems motivated by economic, as well as marketing, reasons.

"One reason for this sudden interest in made-for-pay is because the pay networks want to be assured of a continuous supply of programing," explains John Reidy, a media analyst with New York's Drexel Burnham & Lambert. Indeed, as the flow of product from Hollywood has slowed down, HBO and Showtime have been busy scrambling for alternatives—programs that will have the same appeal to audiences weaned on a Hollywood diet.

The escalating costs of Hollywood blockbusters are also proving a problem for buyers at the pay networks. Compounding the problem is competition. In many instances HBO and Showtime are bidding against the likes of ABC, CBS and NBC, who are more than willing to reduce the time between a film's theatrical release and its tv premiere and also bid up the ante.

"Both HBO and Showtime have reached a size where they can afford to produce for pay," argues Mr. Reidy. Indeed, the revenue base of HBO (11.5 million subscribers) and Showtime (4 million) can support some rather elaborate and lavish productions. Even after spending at a fast clip, the cost of a made-for-pay program per subscriber comes to less than what many of the major distributors are demanding. Not surprisingly, HBO is determined to spend as much as $60 million over the next two years for new programing.

While HBO is demonstrating its strength as a major pay cable

The ebb and flow of funds

By Udayan Gupta

For nearly half a decade—from 1975 to 1980—cable television rode the crest of a seemingly unending wave. The coming of satellite-fed programing, the introduction of pay and then multiple-pay, combined with a surge of profits, created a heady and euphoric environment. The excitement was further fueled by the enthusiasm of the financial markets, pouring in the capital to help the industry grow.

The frenzy has abated somewhat. The inflation of the early 1980s, high interest rates and the exorbitant demands of franchising and new construction seem to have tempered much of the early enthusiasm. Indeed, there are those who believe that the industry is entering a period of growing crisis. A Fortune article argues that competition from the new technologies with alphabet identities—dbs, smatv, lptv, mds—and the high cost of building new urban franchises are sure to dampen the industry's profitability. Not even the increasing presence—50% of all tv households by 1985—is expected to stem cable's declining profitability.

For all the doom-and-gloom predictions, however, the financial community has not lost faith in cable tv. True, it has begun to acknowledge the problems that the industry faces and is somewhat more cautious, but on the whole it continues to feed the industry's voracious appetite. In 1982 alone, the total loans outstanding to the cable industry exceeded $5.5 billion, according to estimates published by Paul Kagan Associates, a Carmel, Cal., cable research company. The report notes that the 1982 figures are 37.5% higher than the previous year's $4 billion outstanding and will increase even further—to $7 billion at the end of 1983.

While debt capital has been plentiful, the equity markets have been less so. Cable companies that had once reached out to investors—especially during the boom of 1975 to 1980—and found them responsive are experiencing more scrutiny and hesitancy. "Investors are worried about the amount of debt that many cable companies have saddled themselves with," notes one industry analyst. "They're much more receptive to the few companies that have a demonstrated record of earnings and earnings growth."

In fact, the Federal Communications Commission's recently released figures for cable in 1981 show that net income before taxes dropped to $40 million, a 79% decrease from the $168 million in net income in 1980. "It wasn't a good market for cable to issue equity," notes Blyth Eastman's Dan Baldini, who points out that the industry never stopped looking for equity capital.

But this does not mean that equity financing has dried out. A number of companies are successfully using limited partnerships as a means of raising equity—not only the pioneers such as Cablevision Systems and Jones Intercable, but others as well. Among some of the smaller companies that have also raised capital through limited partnerships are Tennessee's Matrix Enterprises ($2.8 million) and American Cable TV Investors (a $25 million public offering).

The banks did continue to be the largest players in cable's financing back yard last year. In fact, their participation was underscored even further by the low visibility of the insurance companies—cable tv's other major lender. According to estimates by Paul Kagan Associates, banks provided 79% of the private cable dollars last year, compared with 70% in 1981.

"The future of cable is very much a part of us," says Lewis C. Kleinhans, a vp with Chemical Bank's communications financing group, pointing out that the bank has increased the amount of loans outstanding to cable to $100 million, an increase of $70 million over the last two years. Mr. Kleinhans is determined that the bank will seek to increase its share of the cable financing pie. "As an institution we didn't have a sizable share of the pie," he explains. "With some judicious investing, however, we can increase our share."

The larger bank lenders are not falling back either. Chicago's Continental Illinois Bank and Trust last year continued to lead as the largest lender to cable. "We had more opportunity to get involved in cable financing," points out Kurt Anstaett, a banking officer with Continental Illinois' cable lending group. "Many of the operators came to the bank because of the lesser availability of longer-term financing."

Indeed, that was probably why insurance companies pulled back from loans to the industry last year. "We were short of money," points out C. Stevens Marshall, vp at the Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York. "Most life insurance companies had a variety of pressures on their policy loans."

Another factor that led operators to go to the banks—providers of short-term floating rate loans—was high interest rates. Operators were glad to borrow for the short term, gambling on a decline in interest rates.

Now that rates are down, many cable operators are busy converting their earlier floating-rate loans to lower fixed-rate loans, even though the latter are priced one to three percentage

Media monopoly—as played en France

By Phil Hill

Wiring an urban area for cable is more often than not an exercise in political maneuvering—and the action in Paris seems to bear this out.

If the mayor of Paris, Jacques Chirac, has decided that most of the city will be equipped with cable tv by the end of the decade, it is more because of Mr. Chirac's political ambition to be the next president of France than any commercial reasons or need to advance French technology in the field. This, at least, is the opinion of one media director of a large American agency in Paris.

Mr. Chirac announced his ambitious project in March a few weeks before local elections gave him victory in all 20 Paris districts. Thus, he was confirmed as the only serious opponent to President Francois Mitterrand when presidential elections take place in 1988.

Phil Hill is an ADVERTISING AGE correspondent in Paris.

Cabling Paris and staging the Universal Exhibition in 1989 will help to give Mr. Chirac a national and European presence at the same time. And he will have his own tv channel to challenge the traditional state monopoly.

That the French government should concede even part of its control over the audiovisual media came as a surprise to many. It was in November last year that Louis Mexandeau, minister for posts and telecommunications, announced that the government would be favorable to the development of cable networks and that it would leave the initiative for the creation of such networks and their management to local authorities. At first, such a concession might seem to leave it open for a myriad of private companies to join in the act at the discretion of local political leaders. But a deeper analysis reveals a different reality. Transmissions will still be controlled by the government through the Ministry of Posts and Telecommunications (PTT), which will authorize which tv channels will be broadcast over the cable networks.

The government has decided to actively encourage the setting up of cable networks because it will still retain ultimate control over them. Satellite tv broadcasts will be flooding France with a variety of French and foreign channels beginning in 1985.

Cabling Paris and staging the Universal Exhibition in 1989 will help to give Mr. Chirac a national and European presence at the same time.

If French viewers are already receiving by then a number of additional channels through a cable network at minimum or no cost, there will be much less incentive for them to go out and buy and install an antenna that will pick up the satellite.

"We have lived with the state monopoly for 50 years," says Didier Colas, media director at Ogilvy & Mather, France. "It will take just as long to dismantle it."

Paris' cable system will use the very latest in technology—fiber optic cables and laser transmission. One tiny cable will be able to carry up to 60 channels, including telephone lines, teletext and interactive computer lines.

"France is very behind in cabling compared to the U.S. or Great Britain or Belgium," comments Pierre-Marie Guiollot, media director at Lintas Paris. "But the fact that we are behind means that we can start off with the most modern system very quickly."

Mr. Chirac has promised that half a million homes will be equipped with cable for the opening of the Universal Exhibition in 1989—more than half of all Paris homes.

The first phase would be experimental, scheduled to start next year with the connection of 10,000 homes. It would be limited to only six channels: The three state channels, Mr. Chirac's local channel and two French-speaking foreign channels, in all likelihood Tele Luxembourg and Tele Monte Carlo. The experiment is expected to cost between $10.8 million and $13.4 million, financed partly by the PTT and partly by the city of Paris. Several radio stations would also be plugged in to this first phase.

In the second phase, 130,000 homes would be connected over two years at a cost of $107.5 million, again divided between the state and the Paris authorities. The services available would be the same as in the initial phase.

Beginning in 1987, some 120,000 homes would be equipped each year for three points higher than the going rate for floating rate loans. "The premium is worth paying," argues one banker. "Many operators were having sleepless nights over loans that cost them 20% last year." Many multiple system operators (msos) are replacing the high floating-rate loans by raising subordinated debt in the public markets. John Reidy, an analyst with Drexel Burnham Lambert in New York, points out that subordinated debt financing has raised nearly $800 million for the cable industry—at rates considerably lower than fixed rate loans.

"The ability to raise capital through subordinated debt is a sign of the industry's maturity," explains Sharon Armbrust, director-information services at Paul Kagan Associates. "Besides, it is always more convenient to go to the public markets. Lenders such as the insurance companies can put many restrictions on the use of the loans, often inhibiting growth."

The insurance companies, meanwhile, are not out of the financing picture by any means. Once again laden with cash and in a market where the return from alternative investments—such as government long-term bonds—has dropped dramatically, they seem eager to rejoin cable tv's lending stream.

But the search for capital today seems to have focused on the use of limited partnerships, which provide tax benefits as well as the potential of capital gains. "In the absence of other attractive tax shelters, limited partnerships in cable are proving extremely attractive," notes Drexel Burnham's Mr. Reidy, who estimates that the industry will raise nearly $250 million in limited partnerships this year.

"The opportunities for venture capital financing have decreased because of the attraction of limited partnerships," says Brian B. Applegate, vp at Burr, Egan, Deleage & Co., a Boston venture capital company with extensive commitments in the communications industry. As Mr. Applegate explains it, limited partners—usually those in the 50% tax bracket—are investing only 50 cents on the dollar and, consequently, receiving returns much higher than the venture capitalist can expect from cable. In addition, limited partners tend to set fewer restrictions on the use of that capital than venture capitalists.

The ability to raise capital through debt and equity doesn't necessarily remove the industry's worries. The smorgasbord of new communications technologies is expected to compete intensively with cable for audiences. "Competing forms of distribution pose a threat to cable operators if they get there first, not because they will win over the majority of the subscribers, but because they can skim off enough of the market to jeopardize the economic viability of the franchise of the cable operator," concludes Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette in its "Industry Viewpoint" of October, 1982.

But the real threat to profits comes from the escalating costs of franchising and construction. Industry observers are wondering if cable operators in new urban builds can afford to give up 5% of their gross revenues to city governments, set aside a substantial portion of their channels for the city and municipality's unreimbursed use and still turn a profit. Some analysts are wondering if the billions of dollars committed to urban cable franchises will yield any paybacks at all. "It is not evident that investments in inner city builds are economic," says Mr. Applegate of Burr, Egan, Deleage.

Regardless of the outcome of the problem, cable is undoubtedly in the midst of a gigantic construction boom—one that is expected to corral another $5 billion in investments in the coming years.

"There's a lot more dollars needed for the building of new systems," points out Michael Spiegler, vp and head of the communications lending group at Chemical Bank, adding that the new urban systems will continue to require billions in new plant.

However, a larger proportion of the demand for capital will come from rebuilding and upgrading. "There's a ton of 12-channel systems out there that have to be upgraded," says Blyth Eastman's Mr. Baldini. The reasons are twofold. Msos themselves need to add to existing systems in order to increase the program offerings as well as revenues. There is also pressure from the community and lenders to upgrade the system before it comes up for renewal. Lenders are worried that the operator may lose the franchise in a renewal hearing especially if the system continues to remain without major improvements. By contrast, the communities are using the renewal process to force an operator to upgrade a system—to bring it up to the level of other technologically advanced systems.

Whatever the motivation behind these projects, it is increasingly clear that cable operators have to keep abreast of technological change and provide the state-of-the-art system. If they fail to do so, they could easily lose out to the other communications technologies.

Stroh threatens nets over exclusive pacts

New York—Stroh Brewing Co. is challenging the legality of the longstanding tv network practice of granting advertiser exclusivity in sporting events.

In meetings with network officials, Peter Stroh, chairman of the Detroit-based brewery, said failure to reach a compromise would result in Stroh filing a restraint-of-trade suit against them.

Mr. Stroh's warning followed months of discussion between the brewery and the networks on how Stroh could gain greater franchise as a sports sponsor.

"We have not filed a lawsuit yet," said Christopher Lole, Stroh's vp-corporate planning and development. "We would hope our discussions would stop us from using our legal options

"We made offers to purchase time based on terms and conditions customary to the industry," he continued. For example, he said, "We had wanted to be involved in the USFL, but were not given the opportunity." Mr. Lole added. "We feel that Stroh has all the tools to compete except for having access to these events. We are willing to spend $60 million-plus on network tv buys."

Stroh stresses that legal action would be a last resort and that it is committed to further friendly discussions. Mr. Lole said no further meetings are in the works. "We are ready to meet when it is appropriate to continue our discussion. We are committed to accomplish-

Seven-Up takes direct aim at colas

Like attacks Coke, Pepsi

By ROBERT REED

Seven-Up Co. will lob another explosive into the soft-drink industry camp this week by premiering a new advertising approach for its caffeine-free Like cola. The advertising blatantly states that competitors Coca-Cola and Pepsi-Cola possess unnecessary amounts of caffeine.

The new campaign intensifies Seven-Up's highly combative stance in the soft-drink field, going so far as to parody industry leader Coke's long-time "real thing" slogan.

The Like move closely follows the St. Louis-based company's antiadditive positioning for its 7UP brand, which claims the lemon-lime drink is free of caffeine and artificial flavorings and colors. That push started in late May and angered nearly all of Seven-Up's competitors.

One source who has seen the new Like spots commented, "It doesn't position Like as a decaffeinated cola, but puts it right there between Coke and Pepsi."

The Like campaign, backed by an estimated $35 million budget, employs actor Kevin Dobson, of the CBS' series "Knots Landing," as spokesman. In three tv spots, Mr. Dobson states that only a slight trace of caffeine (derived from the

Troubled TI boosts ad $$

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

Despite a projected loss of $100 million in the second quarter, Texas Instruments says it will increase its advertising budget supporting its line of home and personal computers during the third quarter.

Norman Neureiter, vp-corporate relations at TI, said most of the money will be spent on tv and radio. He declined to say how much the Dallas-based company would spend during the third quarter.

In 1982, TI spent $8.9 million to advertise its small-computer lines, according to Leading National Advertisers. McCann-Erickson is the agency.

Although third-quarter spending will be up, Mr. Neureiter declined to speculate if the trend would carry over into the fourth quarter.

"I can't say if [advertising] spending levels will be maintained," Mr. Neureiter said. "These are pretty tumultuous times down here, and anything we say now becomes a very material happening to the company."

The company has said that it will decrease production of both hardware and software during the rest of 1983.

TI's loss is a direct result of the glut of product at the low end of the computer market, combined with the price wars that ironically were started by TI last summer (AA, Aug. 26) when it announced it would offer a $100 rebate on any purchase of its 99/4A computer. Commodore, Radio Shack and Atari followed with various cuts. At the same time, the Timex/Sinclair 1000 appeared with a $99.95 retail ticket.

Houston—Just about all 15,000 attendees at the National Cable Television Assn. convention here agreed they'd done a pretty lousy job of marketing to potential customers. And they agreed they'd done an even lousier job of serving their existing ones.

Pinpointing cable's shortcomings in customer service is simple. But identifying the industry's broader marketing gaps is far murkier.

So murky, in fact, that there are major contradictions in what the industry's leading honchos are saying, contradications apparent despite the NCTA's determination to portray a united front last week at its largest annual powwow.

"I feel sorry for those poor consumers. God help them," stated Ed Bennett, president of Viacom Cable. "We've paid lip service to this problem long enough," he admitted, referring to the most easily defined problems, that of incompetent installers and perpetually busy phone lines at local systems as customers try to figure out the programing.

"But now we're refocusing on the basics of business that we never mastered in the first place," he continued. "We just can't continue to have cable installers who look like they are going to come back on the weekend and rip you off."

More NCTA coverage on Pages 74 and 75

Combating poor customer service is a problem the industry must face now, because increasingly its future growth lies in attracting new subscribers to its old systems and in hanging on to those it already has. As Showtime president Mike Weinblatt said, "We can't keep rolling out new systems where people gobble up

Network deal put at over $30 million

Ralston kicks off fall tv buys

By JAMES P. FORKAN

New York—The upfront buying for the 1983-84 prime time tv season officially began late last week, when Paul Schulman Co. finalized its eight-digit schedules for Ralston Purina Co. on all three networks.

Referring lightheartedly to his traditional role as the first buyer of each new upfront season in recent memory, Mr. Schulman said: "Let the games begin."

Mr. Schulman did not disclose the size of the Ralston buy (believed by some sources to be more than $30 million), the number of series bought, which network got the biggest slice of the business or the pricing because of competitive and negotiating reasons.

But he did reveal the five programs on each network that he said represented the bulk of his St. Louis-based client's upfront commitments. As usual, the mix on each network consisted of surefire hits and some shows perceived to have growth potential.

On CBS, Ralston bought chunks of "60 Minutes," "Dallas," "Magnum, P.I.," "Alice" and the new "Scarecrow and Mrs. King." At ABC, Mr. Schulman ordered time on "Dynasty," which he predicted would become the No. 1 prime time show in next season's A.C. Nielsen Co. ratings; "Hart to Hart"; "20/20," and newcomers "Hotel" and "Webster." He termed the latter comedy a candidate for "the sleeper hit" of fall.

At NBC, the major shows purchased via the network tv buying subsidiary of Gardner Advertising were "The A Team," "Remington Steele," "Hill Street Blues," "Cheers" and the new "Yellow Rose." The adman lamented that he did not buy "one show that I love, [NBC's] 'Bay City Blues,'" because he and Ralston were unsure it could deliver the account's target demographics.

Known as a shrewd negotiator and a sharp selector of potential hits, Mr. Schulman nonetheless has been known to make a mistake or two.

Last year, he gambled on CBS' "Bring 'em Back Alive" and NBC's "Remington Steele." The latter has begun showing ratings growth with "The A Team" as lead-in, but CBS long ago cut "Alive." But as he points out, his buying strategies are part of a team effort that includes three Ralston executives: William Claggett, vp-director of advertising and marketing services; Lee Zingale, media communications director, and Mary Howard,

New York—Severiano (Seve) Ballesteros recently took his mind off winning golf tournaments long enough to have his lawyers sue R.J. Reynolds Tobacco for using a model that allegedly resembles him in Vantage cigarets' "taste of success" ad campaign.

The suit filed in federal district court here accuses Winston-Salem, N.C.-based RJR and its New York agency, Leber Katz Partners, of invasion of privacy, "unlawful appropriation of plaintiff's likeness" and "unjust enrichment."

It also seeks compensatory and punitive damages, but no dollar amount was listed. Mr. Ballesteros, a native of Spain, won the 1980 and 1983 Masters Tournaments and was ranked as the No. 1 professional golfer in the world in 1982.

Gannett's KRON deal hits snags

By BOB MARICH

The sale of the NBC-TV affiliate in San Francisco has stalled, raising questions about whether buyer Gannett Co. will ever be able to complete the complex transaction, valued at well over $200 million.

Chronicle Publishing, owner of KRON-TV, first disclosed that an agreement in principle to sell the station had been reached in late September. But a formal application has yet to be filed with the Federal Communications Commission.

Complications involving Gannett's USA Today printing operation in the Bay Area, objections of a local publisher and the NBC network's May sweeps rating improvement, increasing the value of the station in the eyes of Chronicle Publishing, are believed to be the leading snags.

Jeff Davidson, president of Gannett's broadcasting unit, said in a telephone interview that he expects the sale eventually to go through. "It's just a very complicated deal," he explained. Chronicle Publishing, the private company owned by the Thierot family that publishes San Francisco

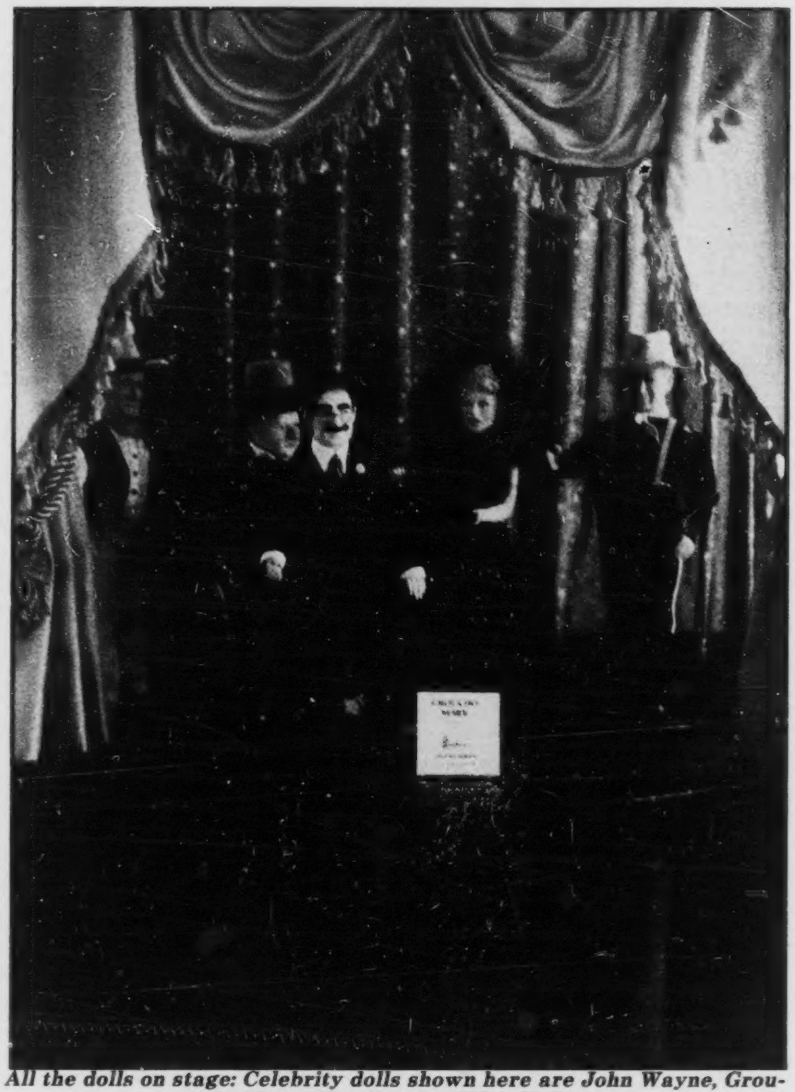
Dolls aren't merely child's play

By Matthew F. Mansfield



All the dolls on stage: Celebrity dolls shown here are John Wayne, Groucho Marx, Mae West and W.C. Fields.

Eight years ago dolls were dead, as far as Helen Nolan was concerned. Sensing a demand for better quality items, this former advertising copywriter and doll collector opened her New York store, the Magnificent Doll. Within a short time, frustrated by the contemporary quality standards for dolls and marginal sales, she closed her doors. Instead, her appreciation of older values has led her to the small but lucrative world of antique doll dealing.

Dolls are hot now. The toy market moves in cycles or phases according to popular fashion and interest. The stuffed animal that was big two years ago might be passe today while another segment is taking off. Currently, doll sales are at a peak period, according to doll company executives. This view is bolstered by many who believe that videogames have passed their peak.

Dolls offer more playability at lower prices, they believe; girls are unsatisfied with videogames, and the public is overwhelmed by electronics for now.

By the end of 1982 factory shipments for all dolls and doll accessories were estimated at 13% of the toy category, excluding videogames, up 52% over 1981. This came at a time when total toys had declined 4% over the same period. The retail value of the doll market was put at a whopping $1.13 billion.

At the heart of this unusual growth is the development of three distinct doll markets, reflecting more sophisticated consumer tastes than ever before.

Dollars and 'dollers'

As with several recent trends, changes in the doll market seem to be associated with the early 1970s oil crisis. Many doll company managers agree with Helen Nolan that doll quality was then inferior. The reasons offered were many: Big price increases in petroleum-based materials, more competition from imports, lack of consumer demand. What's more, the persistent inflation that came later in the 1970s tested the magical $10 retail price dividing volume sales from specialty items.

Mass marketers tried several strategies. To maintain below $10 retail pricing, for instance, they introduced smaller dolls, creating the "minidoll" segment. The initial slow public reaction improved as the marketers replaced the tough rubber dolls with softer vinyl, more life-like ones.

Licensing and heavier advertising stimulated demand and competition among the larger corporations.

The marketers used separate strategies to rationalize above-$10 prices, including more price step points (combined with more turnover of designs), more packaging of dolls with accessories to enhance playing appeal and more use of sets to encourage multiple purchases.

Retailers also reacted to inflationary stress by splitting doll sales along price lines.

Discounters and toy supermarkets featured lower prices to build volume. Department and specialty stores aggressively merchandised higher-priced items through doll shows, celebrity appearances, designer themes and other techniques.

Other less-defined influences have also been at work. The rise of the U.S. birth rate because of delayed marriages among the post-World War II babies accounts for some of the growth. A hidden though unsupported implication in the data is an above-average "first-born" generation. It is believed that more is spent on them by parents and relatives than on later children.

And there is the parallel growth of the adult doll collector market. While collector dollar sales are a small segment, the impact of "dollers," as collectors refer to themselves, is enormous. In a separate response to the oil crisis and subsequent inflation, the demand for quality took doll collecting out of the backyard and into the auction hall.

For the last five years public awareness of the potential value of antique dolls has been alerted by publicity from doll auctioneers and dealers through price guides, more accessible appraisals and new print vehicles directed to collectors. With the scarcity of old designs antique prices have soared out of reach for most collectors.

The slipstream effect has pulled along an entirely new market, "modern collectibles."

Perhaps the most critical element is the willingness of "dollers" to meet the prices demanded for modern collectibles. The unexpected growth of this segment derives from not only frustrated collectors seeking more dolls at affordable prices but also people starting collections for aesthetic, investment, even nostalgic reasons.

The prospect of this untapped demand is leading to complex relationships among mass, modern collectible and antique segments.

Barbies and babies

The huge portion of doll sales represent "play" dolls in contrast to "shelf" dolls. The former are for children, generally ages 4 to 10, and the latter for older collectors. Play dolls are made up of several subsegments:

- Action figures, i.e. solid forms with limited movement and adventure themes that are considered dolls statistically but not conventionally.
- Baby dolls, made of any variety of materials and sculpted to resemble a real baby.
- Fashion dolls, i.e. solid forms with older appearances and capable of changing apparel.
- Minidolls, generally smaller (under 10 ins.) figures in sets or families.
- Rag dolls, i.e. stuffed fabric figures.
- Others include collector dolls made of materials from vinyl to bisque (unglazed porcelain) with articulated features and detailed finish.

Another industry convention is to divide dolls into tv and basic dolls. The former group are those heavily promoted on tv and estimated to be sold at a 30% to 35% retail margin. The latter refers primarily to dolls not promoted heavily and selling at a higher 40% to 45% margin, e.g. baby and collector dolls.

Licensed designs are more apt to be tv dolls because volume is needed to pay royalties and earn profits. Traditionally, the advertising-to-sales ratio for an established tv doll will be around 12% with up to 20% for a major introduction. However, well researched "personality" dolls with emphasis on expression and possibly public domain names or themes are also being advertised heavily to counter licensed properties.

Among the forces driving mass market dolls is the extraordinary rise of the "cute and cuddly" trend, best characterized by minidolls. At the end of 1982, sales for this segment ran more than 45% ahead of 1981. Kenner's Strawberry Shortcake, with nearly $6 million in advertising support, has been the main force. This line includes not only various figures to encourage set collection but also different sizes from hard-rubber mini to 14-in. vinyl versions.

Mattel has already announced its competitive answer for 1983 with the launch of Herself, The Elf, a group of whimsical pixies. LJN Toys Ltd., New York, is introducing its Shirt Tales family of five figures based on a Saturday morning tv program. In the same spirit Hasbro has unveiled its floral-scented Charmkin jewelry and toy collection.

What makes this design direction attractive to doll makers is the ability to produce in quantity at low cost in the Orient, Mexico, even Haiti and amortize import duties charged on bulk over more items. The result is a minidoll can cost as little as $2.40 at wholesale and still retail at a very desirable $5.

Along with downsizing dolls has been the marketer push of "family" concepts to encourage multiple purchases. Evidently, consumers are quite willing to buy sets, a precursor to serious collecting. The minidolls mentioned above have different personalities as well as pets and accessories with doll houses doubling as carrying cases. New items are phased in each year so that a $5 initial purchase can quickly balloon.

The same phenomenon has been appearing with fashion dolls. Variations in expression, hair styling, dimension have given rise to groups of Barbies, Glamour Gals and Kimberlies during a single year instead of annual rotation. With slightly higher price points a single Barbie with accessories and room can run as high as $50 in the store. Gift-givers probably breathe sighs of relief when children start collecting, because anxiety over future selections is temporarily minimized.

A third factor in the growth of mass market sales has been the consistent success of the Barbie doll. Now in its 24th year, this line represents 80% of the $298 million fashion doll segment and has surpassed its prior year sales every year. Despite new competition, 1982 sales were over 25% ahead of 1981.

Mattel public relations staffer Peggy Hummes points out that Barbie sales alone make this line the fourth largest toy company in the world. With 36 new fashions each year the company is the world leader in pret-a-porter clothes. With more than $11 million in measured media spending, Barbie had the largest advertising budget for any toy during 1982.

Continued segmentation of the market is ahead: My First Barbie is directed at girls as young as 3 so that a 10-year age playing span is established early, while capturing a share of the younger and appealing minidollmarketing.

An International Barbie with a new doll each year is planned at a $12 suggested retail price the upper end of the price range.

Barbie is on the verge of being a cultural institution. The Barbie fan club is holding its annual meeting in Phoenix this May and eagerly awaits the 25th meeting for which Mattel has special collections promised. The first Barbie children are, or about to be, mothers, so that the cycle will renew.

Needless to say, the battle for the No. 2 fashion doll is being waged furiously. A serious contender appears to be LJN's Brooke Shields. Following its 1982 debut, the 1983 Prom Party Brooke celebrates the high school graduation of the famous model.

Trade reports of this "personality" doll's sales are mixed possibly because of the limited product line and dependence on a real person for identity.

Harvey Katz, LJN marketing manager, asserts that not only the company but also the Shields family are committed to the success of the line. The initial advertising budget of about $1.5 million and willingness of the model herself to make store appearances support this contention. Given the dominance of an original like Barbie, this strategy has its merits.

Other entries use a nonlicensed approach: A collection with a $2 million ad budget called Glamour Gals from Kenner, Fashion Tressy from Ideal and a lively new entry called Kimberly from TOMY. Marching to its own tune, Fisher-Price Toys is spending $1.5 million behind its four-doll dressing and grooming line, My Friend.

Albeit limited, even rag dolls have benefited from licensing with Annie, Holly Hobbie, Sesame Street entries and promotion of classics like Raggedy Ann and Andy. Hasbro intends to support heavily these recent acquisitions from Knickerbocker.

Despite high hopes and new entries, the baby doll market is considered by industry sources to be hurting from high prices and lack of new features. Sales are fragmented among many companies experimenting with different approaches: More packaging of accessories with the doll (Goldberger's All This and Dolly Too and Ideal's Happi Returns); more novelty features (LJN's Valley Girl talking doll); more promotional support as promised for Mattel's Baby-That-Away. Particularly noteworthy is that many of these companies have developed new lines of dolls appealing not to children but to adults.

Contemporary collectibles

Today's collectors are yesterday's children. Doug Thompson, Toy Manufacturers of America president, believes a primary cause for the mass and collector doll sales boom is the sustained promotion of Barbie. Certainly doll collecting appears to have grown up.

Estimating the actual size of modern collectibles is difficult. Generally, the market is believed to be around $30 million at retail, though no official audit exists. The amount of new product activity and number of companies involved make the segment seem much larger.

The actual number of collectors is also hard to guess because doll collecting has been a relatively quiet pastime. Starting around World War II, the hobby was organized into clubs, but only with auctioning and appreciating values did membership jump. The United Federation of Doll Clubs has more than 15,000 members, which is viewed as the tip of the iceberg. Circulation of the primary collector print vehicle, the Doll Reader, has doubled to 40,000 during the last five years. Finally, a widely held though undocumented belief is that doll collecting has just surpassed coins as the second most popular hobby in this country.

Doll collectors represent all ages and share attitudes more than demographics. Common traits seem to be an attachment to childhood as well as sensitivity to style portrayed through clothing and expressions. Some collectors specialize, others are omnivorous once the habit is established. The average doll collector is willing to spend more than $600 annually and may have 200 to 400 dolls, according to Ideal's director of product planning, Henry Garfinkle.

Mattel is in its second year with a new line of collector dolls, including this group called Mariko.

Manufacturers may not be attracted to this segment because of limited production and the expertise required to satisfy the scrutiny of collectors. On the other hand, the opportunity to make a quality statement about a doll product line with less concern about pricing has drawn a crowd.

Prior to 1975 and still today, the Alexander Doll Co., New York, is considered the grande dame of modern collectible dolls in the U.S. Madame Alexander dolls have been sold annually on allocation since 1972 because "we will not sacrifice quality for value," according to general sales manager Jay Schwartz. He claims the dolls are made only for children, but a set of six dolls valued at $240 seven years ago now fetches more than $1,000.

During 1975 Effanbee Dolls, New York, introduced limited edition dolls to capitalize on the pent-up collector demand. Combining fresh, varied designs with aggressive marketing, the company has expanded the market and shown an annual sales increase exceeding 25% for the last three years. Selection of design subjects is somewhat intuitive so that Effanbee can maintain a surprise element in the line.

Quickly following the Effanbee lead, the Royal House of Dolls, New York, added the "Curio Cabinet Collection" of bisque dolls to its well recognized baby and fashion doll lines in 1979. The company will also take orders from towns to make up a doll of special interest to that town. Company president Elsa Rajic has designed as few as 500 dolls for one community and watched the initial $55 price go to more than $600 in a year and a half. At the 1983 Toy Fair, Royal, Effanbee and Alexander were surrounded by more than 30 rivals.

What sets contemporary collectibles apart from mass market dolls are the quality of craftsmanship and materials and the price. Clearly not intended for daily play, a vinyl collector doll can range from $50 to $100 at retail. Depending on size, porcelain versions run from $125 to around $500 with notable exceptions.

Contemporary collectibles seem to fall into three broad areas. First are general themes capable of relating several dolls and avoiding licensing royalties. Alexander's Opera and Little Women; Effanbee's Great Moments in Literature and Presidents; Royal House of Dolls' Mary Jane in the States and Dollspart's Bridal series are examples. Nursery tale and fancy dress collections are featured by several companies.

A second group is a stylized look usually associated with a particular designer and the basis for a "signature" collection. Included here are dolls by Sasha Morgenthaler, a Swiss sculptress and

The many faces of Marilyn

Like the real lady, the Marilyn Monroe doll is already a larger-than-life story. Inspiration, rejection, dispute and fanfare have elevated this star-struck creation into an extravaganza.

Representing the Monroe estate and heirs, Roger Richman opened bidding for the doll licensing rights during June, 1982. His Los Angeles-based company, Richman Productions, had previously concluded similar agreements with Effanbee Dolls for W.C. Fields, Mae West and Groucho Marx.

By August, out of the four competing manufacturers, Richman chose World Doll Co. because of "its high quality design, large production capability, marketing acumen and sensitivity to the press." The most significant reason appears to be the doll company's willingness to meet the royalty demands, far in excess of the normal 6% to 7%.

Timing and competitive pressure pushed World Doll to take the plunge. Three years earlier the company had been spun out of Eugene Doll, a noted play doll company, to make and market contemporary collectible dolls created by a designer, Louis Nichole. After a successful start, the company was looking for a new property to build sales. "It was like a gift from the gods," marvels World Doll partner, Bob Seidenberg.

Through the Eugene Doll Brooklyn manufacturing plant the popularly priced vinyl version ($70 to $75) could be easily achieved for an unlimited one-year run. With the Louis Nichole experience a higher priced ($400) porcelain edition of 7,500 was also attainable. Big inspiration took form in the lavish costuming of the $6,500 version, limited to 300 copies.

New York Times advertising by Ben Kahn sparked Mr. Seidenberg to pursuade the furrier to lay out and make the white fur coat for the ultra-Marilyn.

The resemblance to the real Marilyn Monroe—and the price—varies depending on the maker of the "celibrity" dolls.

Not child's play

Paul Klee protege, for International Playthings; Suzanne Gibson for Reeves International and Jerri McCloud of North Carolina for the husband-and-wife company, Dolls by Jerri. In its second year Mattel is expanding its styled collector dolls to 10 and expects $750,000 in sales.

By far, the most visible group in 1983 has been the "celebrity" or personality dolls. American fixation with royalty has been answered by English (House of Nesbitt) and American (Goldberger) versions of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Dollspart's Princess Grace doll is being legally challenged by Prince Rainier.

Effanbee continues its movie-legend series with the memorable Groucho Marx, and Ideal celebrated Shirley Temple's 50th anniversary of her movie-making debut with a 10,000 limited porcelain edition of the child star.

Center stage belongs to World Doll's Marilyn Monroe.

Not to be confused with a rival series based on 20th Century-Fox movie roles, this doll is being produced for one year under an official license. Three versions are available: A $70 red-dress vinyl one; a white sequin full-length dress one at $400; one with a full-length dress, Ben Kahn white mink coat and removable diamond earrings for $6,500.

Of the 300 top-of-the-line Marilyn Monroe dolls, 265 have already been sold. Several were purchased, flown to Boston, picked up in a white Rolls-Royce, and dropped off one-by-one to each store location of Jordan Marsh. Serious collectors and doll dealers may be skeptical about the price/value of the Marilyn Monroe doll, but the doll aftermarket has seen some pretty breath-taking changes.

Antiques in the aftermarket

"A lot of collecting is in the chase," says Shirley Buchholtz, president-elect of the United Federation of Doll Clubs. During 38 years of chasing she has seen the value of dolls level off but never drop and believes her collection is a "far better investment than my husband's portfolio."

The rise of the aftermarket for buying and selling dolls has left many collectors with mixed feelings. The opportunity to realize investment growth has boosted the value of this hobby, financially and culturally.

However, more people have been attracted so that competition has raised prices for rarer items and dissipated certain personal aspects of negotiating.

The real focus of this aftermarket is not modern collectibles but antiques, those dolls dating back 75 years or more. Given the durability and self-evident aesthetics of older dolls, it seemed inevitable they would appreciate. Within the last five years the specialized knowledge of dealers and auction houses has accelerated broader recognition of these values.

This young couple, born in 1915, is made of stretched muslin painted with oil paint.

Although very roughly estimated at $10 million in sales for 1982, this segment has shown remarkable growth. Five years ago, Theriault's, Annapolis, Md., the only company specializing in antique and collectible doll auctions and appraisals, did $300,000 at auctions.

With an on-going publicity effort, seminars and regional auctions it sold $3 million for 1982. On Jan. 8, 1983, it set the world price of $38,000 for a single doll sold at auction.

George Theriault, the owner, says that despite the jump in values "nobody is entering the market strictly for investment purposes." The basic appeal is still primarily to the hearts and tastes of collectors.

Dolldom in the doldrums?

From all appearances the doll market is going to get bigger and more complex. As a smaller reflection of the world, segments of the mass market will cycle through fads and fashions. The drive toward low cost, high-unit moving dolls is well established across action figures, minidolls, even fashion dolls, so that design variations will be more important.

A growing concern among the larger baby doll makers is direct competition from manufacturers in the Orient, if U.S. trade restrictions are eased. This prospect plus market resistance to higher prices for single dolls suggests that U.S. manufacturers will either downsize, merge for economies of scale or expand into other segments as a hedge.

Given the aging of America and demand for quality, modern collectibles seem assured of a strong future. The current rush to the marketplace with so many lines is due for a shakeout as collector assessments affect the aftermarket. Because company reputation and standards are so critical to sustain values, acquisition of smaller recognized companies by major doll companies would not be surprising.

As a comparatively new force, antique dealing should also grow. More antique collections are likely to be discovered, and the impact of modern collectibles will be factors. However, the aesthetic and expertise requirements may slow movement. Diversification toward other areas seems imminent with miniature and teddy bear enthusiasts leading the way.

At the heart of any doll purchase is an emotional decision. Simple as it seems, dolls are reflections of ourselves. In an era when our lives appear directed by large faceless forces, dolls may very well restore a sense of control and humanity last experienced in childhood.

Marilyn

Louis Nichole designed the aluminum-mesh dress, which was run off by an old-line Boston maker of ladies' mesh pocketbooks, Whiting & Davis. Mr. Seidenberg found other sources to cut the real diamond earrings when Tiffany got cold feet over potential Monroe hoopla.

Sculptured by Joyce Christopher, a consultant to several major toy companies, the Marilyn Monroe doll is anatomically correct right down to her knocked knees. The 18-in. vinyl model measures 9½ by 6½ by 9½-in. with proportionate reductions for the 16½-in. porcelain copies. The facial expression was more demanding.

At one time two heads existed for the vinyl torso. The original "subtle" approach portrayed more the person, less the legend. In the final analysis the famous open-mouth, half-closed eyes caricature prevailed for marketing purposes. There followed countless cosmetic experiments with and without the beauty mark. Only after they inspected the photographs did they determine the beauty mark was a Monroe affixment.

The first shipment of dolls caused pandemonium at New York's F.A.O. Schwartz. A Wells Fargo truck complete with two guards delivered the cargo on the main floor. Boston's Jordan Marsh shipped its consignment of $6,500 dolls, one to a location, via a white Rolls-Royce. Finally, a videotape cassette produced by World Doll showing how a plastic bag covering the doll torso was needed to slip on the skin-tight red dress may have launched a trend in putting on jeans for Beverly Hills' Broadway Stores matrons.

Rival dolls have been introduced under a 20th Century-Fox license for the Monroe film roles and by an English designer, Paul Crees. The latter is viewed as a minor threat, while legal action against the former is being considered by World Doll and the Monroe estate.

In keeping with contemporary collectible marketing, World Doll plans to produce the Marilyn Monroe doll for one year only. Follow-up plans are already set for an Elvis Presley doll under license from Richman Productions.

Roger Richman anticipates that even bigger sales and royalties will be generated when he concludes licensing agreements for Clark Gable. For now, the Marilyn Monroe doll appears to have transcended the form and become the stuff that dreams are made of. —M.F.M

International ad fest may tell

U.K. creative slipping?

By HOWARD SHARMAN

London—At last year's International Advertising Film Festival, the awards given to British advertising agencies and production companies, claimed by some observers to be the best in the world, were disappointing.

It was a Japanese agency Hakuhodo, that took the highest award, the Grand Prix, and Brazilian agencies walked away with four Gold Lion awards.

So at this year's festival, to be held this week in Venice, the question is: Will the U.K. continue to reign supreme in ad creativity competitions or is the title passing to others?

Even in London, warning notes are sounding. Richard Barket, executive director of D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius, says, "In many respects we had the best production companies in the world up to around four years ago. But now it looks as though the agency is working more than overtime to get the results it wants."

He feels that now that the Alan Parkers ("Bugsy Malone," "Midnight Express," "Fame") and the Ridley Scotts ("Alien," "Blade Runner") have gone off to make films in Hollywood, the current generation of directors is not as good. "There seemed to be fewer ideas around last year and things are sliding a bit. But that is a trend that can be reversed."

British agencies still won more than their share of awards last year. They won seven of the 17 Gold Lions, plus three first places in the Palme d'Or production awards, with three other production companies in the top 10. By comparison, in this competition U.S. agencies won. . .nothing.

"I am not being chauvinistic at all when I say the U.K. is still tops," says Len Weinreich, a judge at the festival in Cannes last year. Last year Mr. Weinreich was creative director of Wasey Campbell-Ewald, London, but is now running his own agency, Weinreich Walsh Ward.

He picks Brazil, Spain and Australia as the upcoming countries in creative competitions, but does not see the U.K. being toppled from its perch for a while.

Allen Thomas, executive creative director at J. Walter Thompson Co., London, tends to agree that the British are still the best, although he adds: "My feeling is that the best in the U.S. is as good as the best here, but how seriously do they take festivals like these?"

The Japanese score high not so much because of sheer creativity but because of technical brilliance. "Japan wins more on technical achievement than on ideas," says Mr. Weinreich. "The ideas are often old, unless they are technical ideas."

What is certain is that many entries at Venice will be based on last year's winners, and that this year's winners will stand out from the crowd and then be copied to death, both in Europe and the U.S. "When you have to look at 2,000 films, you know after seeing 50 what the current crop of cliches is going to be," says Mr. Weinreich. "Then, when something really good comes up, you can hear an audible sigh of relief around the room."#

introduction of Pure soap for sensitive skin, Westport Labs will introduce Collagen moisturizing bar, to retail in the range of $1.85 to $2.25 each.

The ad budget was not disclosed, but one-third page ads are scheduled to run this fall in women's magazines.

In the larger and more mature categories of haircare and cosmetics, marketers are either introducing new products and/or refining strategies behind existing brands.

Clairol, which last year introduced Color Renewal System as a conditioning hair color for women starting to gray, will air a new campaign this fall stressing gray coverage.

Clairol's CRS is handled by Gleckler & Spiegel, the agency also responsible for the first campaign that retailers have said confused consumers as to the purpose of the product.

Clairol, which recently introduced Touch A Sun hair lightener and next month will launch Light Effects hair lightener (AA, May 16), also is showing an aggressive bent in other haircare categories. The company is considering Linda Evans of ABC's "Dynasty" as spokeswoman for all its products and is introducing a new product to stimulate consumer interest in home permanents—Party Perm, a perm that can be washed out as soon as 24 hours after application.

Due this fall, it will sell for around $4.89 and be supported by less than $2 million in advertising. Packaging will refer to Clairol's Kindness home permanent (introduced last year) with the notation, "If you like this, try Kindness."

The real surprise in home permanents, though, comes not from a new brand but from an old one. Last March, Lehn & Fink began an estimated $4 million campaign on its Ogilvie home permanent via agency Geers Gross. Included was the product's first tv support, on daytime and fringe tv. Market-share figures from March and April show that the previously No. 4-ranked Ogilvie became the No. 1-selling home perm in drugstores, which account for 65% of all sales, and moved ahead of now No. 2-ranked Toni (Gillette), Rave (Chesebrough-Pond's) and Lilt (Procter & Gamble).

L'Oreal, a Clairol competitor in home permanents and its arch-rival in hair coloring, also may soon expand into other segments of the market. L'Oreal sells a foam conditioner in Europe and is considering importing the product.

Other L'Oreal plans include the introduction of its repackaged eye shadows this fall. Last spring it introduced repackaged and reformulated versions of its lip and nail products, with an $8 million-plus budget, and the company will reportedly spend $20 million on all its cosmetics next year. McCann-Erickson is the agency.

Meanwhile, Revlon, Maybelline and Max Factor & Co. also have new makeup products in the works. Next year Revlon will introduce individualized eye makeup palettes, so described because the consumer will choose her own color pans that will then be assembled into a palette.

This fall, Max Factor will introduce a makeup compact, called Colors to Go, with a tv campaign from Wells, Rich, Greene, and Maybelline has scheduled a major introduction of shine-free makeup, a line to be supported by more than $3 million in advertising.

Chesebrough-Pond's is coming out with an addition to its Cutex nail enamel line. Called Pop Polish, it consists of 12 shades of special-effects nail enamel. The line will be advertised separately from the basic Cutex line, with a $500,000 print campaign from Waring & LaRosa.

Health & beauty aids marketers have also picked up on another trend: The much-debated premenstrual syndrome. Both Jeffrey Martin Inc. and Chattem evidently take the side that such a problem exists and should be treated with products separate from existing menstrual-discomfort tablets and capsules like Chattem's own Pamprin. Chattem is introducing Premesyn PMS via Marschalk Co., and Jeffrey Martin Inc. will introduce Pursettes premenstrual tablets via its in-house agency.

Martin seems to be trying to extend its marketing clout to the more glamorous side of the h&ba business as well. Reported to be casting about for an acquisition of a cosmetics company, it was learned that Martin is testing Ruth Lane perfume stick, priced at around $4 to $5. Martin does not own the Ruth Lane brand, but has options to buy it if the test pans out.

Also in a fragrance test is Charles of the Ritz Group. The company is bringing Enjoli Midnite into the Chicago market, via Advertising to Women.#

International ad expenditures were up in 1981, according to a Starch INRA Hooper study, a report sponsored by the International Advertising Assn., New York. Ad spending totaled $118.5 billion in 1981, up almost 6% from 1980's $111.5 billion. U.S. ad spending represented about half of the world's advertising expenditures total, $61 billion, a 10% increase over 1980. Japan was second with $11 billion, West Germany and the U.K. with about $6 billion each and France with $4.5 billion. Print remained the primary medium in most countries, accounting for roughly 41%. Television came in with 21% of the total, while radio garnered 6%.

ABC votes no on bulk sales

By ROBERT REED

The Audit Bureau of Circulations board voted last week against a proposed rule change that would have allowed newspaper publishers to include some bulk sales figures within the paid circulation numbers they provide to the bureau.

The proposed change was defeated because some national advertisers, major local retailers and advertising agencies voiced strong opposition to the action.

The issue also split the newspaper industry as major organizations lined up on both sides. Knight-Ridder, Gannett Co., Chicago Tribune, New York Times and Los Angeles Times favored the inclusion of bulk sales, while the Dallas Morning News, Washington Post, Detroit News, Toronto Star and the S.I. Newhouse chain were against the action.

David Keil, president of ABC, did not reveal the 33-member board's vote count, but said the lack of support made it "safe to assume the subject will not be reintroduced."

Yet those who favored the bill contend the matter is not dead and will resurface. "This is round one," said Thomas Johnson, publisher of the Los Angeles Times.

Bulk sales are copies or subscriptions purchased in quantities of 11 or more and used to promote the business of the purchaser, such as "giveaways" at hotels and conventions.

The issue was initially raised at the ABC board's February meeting and tabled until directors met last week in Bermuda. The plan called

Bandits out to steal bite from cigarets

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

U.S. Tobacco is plunking down $2 million for a campaign aimed at convincing cigaret smokers anxious to kick the habit that they can switch to new Skoal Bandits—small pouches containing wintergreen-flavored smokeless tobacco. The pouches are placed between lip and gum.

"What we're doing is directing oral tobacco at an entirely new demographic group," said William Nelson, marketing services director for Greenwich, Conn.-based U.S. Tobacco. Until now, smokeless users have been found chiefly in suburban and rural areas.

He added that the introductory move into the Big Apple—where the use of chewing tobacco and smokeless tobacco admittedly is low—stems from encouraging testing in Connecticut and southeastern coastal markets (AA, Dec. 20) and the knowledge that if the product succeeds

Fox Photo snaps up Landon for ad role

San Antonio—Actor Michael Landon, the longtime ad spokesman for Kodak who was just recently dropped by the photography giant, is the new spokeman for Fox Photo.

The photofinisher broke a new series of tv spots June 26 throughout its 24-state marketing area.

Themed, "If a picture is worth taking, trust it to Fox," the campaign features Mr. Landon in tv, print and p.o.p materials, all through Levenson & Levenson, Dallas.

Fox also has launched a Dallas test in which the photofinisher offers options of one-hour service for a premium, Fox's standard tomorrow-or-free service or two-day service at a savings.

Fox Photo operates 1,200 retail outlets, services 5,000-plus wholesale accounts and offers photofinishing service nationally by mail.#

Upswing in sight, B/PAA told

By CHUCK WINGIS

Denver—Business-to-business marketing, after a prolonged slump in most sectors, appears on the verge of an upswing, paced by encouraging gains in print advertising.

That was the prediction of John W. DeWolf, vp-corporate research, Cahners Publishing, during a presentation last week at the 61st international conference of the Business/Professional Advertising Assn. here. The optimism expressed by Mr. DeWolf was echoed by other conference speakers.

Despite a drop of 5.2% in pages expected by year's end and an 8.5% drop in 1982 from the previous year, Mr. DeWolf sees the start of a dramatic turnaround, beginning this month, that will produce a 4% gain in 1984.

Because of increased page rates, publishers will experience no loss of revenues this year, he said, and this same factor should account for a 10% increase in revenues over 1983 figures.

The Cahners research head based his forecasts on industrial production, a leading economic indicator in the company's business cycle outlook, which will peak in December, an expected 5% increase over last year.

The increase in industrial production, which usually presages a similar boost in print advertising by a few months, "will certainly continue well into 1985 and will continue to break new ground until at least 1986," he said.

Offering a counterpoint to print—main thrust of the conference presentations—was a workshop given by a panel of speakers from ad agency Campbell-Ewald called, "Challenging the Print Bastion." The session stressed the use of new electronic media to reduce the $200-plus cost of a sales call in business-to-business marketing.

David C. Martin, senior vp at C-E, said new video options, such as cable tv, offer demographic possibili-

Ad leaders laud court veto ruling

By RICHARD L. GORDON

Washington—Advertising industry leaders believe their efforts to restrict the Federal Trade Commission's authority are enhanced by a Supreme Court ruling last week that voided Congress' "legislative veto" power.

American Assn. of Advertising Agencies president Leonard Matthews, although a supporter of the legislative veto concept, said congressmen "sitting on the fence" about restricting FTC authority can no longer say, "Don't worry too much because we always have the legislative veto in case the regulators get overzealous."

Officials at the American Advertising Federation and Assn. of National Advertisers echoed that view, and congressional defenders of the veto agreed the decision will force lawmakers to consider taking back some of the powers they have delegated to the President and to independent agencies like FTC.

The court said Congress cannot reverse decisions of government agencies without going through the formality of passing a law and having it signed by the President or, if he vetoes it, passed over his veto. One FTC rule, the used-car

FCB offering acquisition, licensing aid

By PAT SLOAN

New York—Until now, acquisition and licensing searches have been the almost exclusive domain of such middlemen as investment bankers and individual consultants. But with the establishment of Foote, Cone & Belding's International Partnerships division, ad agencies soon may be competing for that lucrative turf.

For more than a year, FCB has been quietly selling the services of this new division, which specializes in multinational acquisitions, joint ventures and licensing agreements. Last week, it went public on the project at Cosmo/Expo II, the annual cosmetics industry trade show at the New York Coliseum.

"I was afraid every Young & Rubicam, Ogilvy & Mather and every other international agency would do the same if we announced this any sooner," said International Partnerships president Alan Klein during an interview with Advertising Age following his Cosmo/Expo presentation. "I wanted to get the division off the ground first."

Mr. Klein, who most recently was worldwide account director on Clairol and group management director on Oroweat Foods at FCB, said the new division currently has six clients. In a search for more, it is mailing brochures detailing the division's purpose.

Among its existing clients, several have no advertising accounts at FCB nor are they expected to, Mr. Klein said. There have been no problems with agencies that han-

Slick brochure tells marketers the advantages of tying in with baseball star Pete Rose of the Philadelphia Phillies, who is expected to reach a record 4,192 base hits sometime next season.

Marketing Pete Rose's record hit

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

It is a day in late summer, 1984; Pete Rose at bat.

The camera closes in on his usual fidgeting in the batter's box, then pans the crowd. The fans are standing, and the tension is almost palpable: With one more base hit, Pete Rose will break Ty Cobb's record.

A narrator tries to capture the drama. "On that magical summer day when Pete Rose strokes his 4,192nd hit it will be a shot heard round the world," he intones. "You can be part of that magic. You can be part of the legend that is Pete Rose."

So goes a filmed staging of Pete Rose's big moment, as envisioned by a New York marketing agency called Robert Landau Associates. Landau soon will be showing the film to companies across the country, trying to persuade them to add the "magic" of Pete Rose's name to their selling efforts. It is but one element of what is shaping up as a classic—and controversial—packaging of an American athlete.

Agency chiefs' perks add up

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

New York—Charles Goldschmidt, the 61-year-old chairman of Laurence, Charles & Free, has the distinction of being the agency executive who draws the biggest known salary in the advertising business.

Among executives now toiling at publicly held agencies, Mr. Goldschmidt is No. 1, earning $830,710 annually, consisting of $171,362 as his base pay and $659,348 in bonus money. His agency is owned by the Mickelberry Corp., with which Mr. Goldschmidt has a contract that contains a golden clause: He gets "incentive compensation" for the period of Jan. 1, 1980, through Dec. 21, 1985, that equals 10% of Laurence, Charles & Free's pretax income, up to $350,000, and 15% of the excess over that amount.

For 1982, the Laurence agency reported $26.2 million in gross income on billings of $175 millio[illegible]

Perquisites, or perks, and assorted other benefits are the name of the game for those who have scaled the agency ladder, as a reading of the small print in the various publicly held agencies' proxy statements discloses. Have you seen Ford ad lately?

By JOSEPH M. WINSKI

Have you driven a Ford lately?

Whether you have or haven't, indications are you've seen or heard some of the Ford advertising that's been closing with that line lately.

According to adWatch, a monthly survey of advertising awareness, Ford advertising in May posted the largest monthly gain in awareness among car and truck advertisers since the survey began in April, 1982. Ford's awareness rose 7.3 percentage points, to 21.4% of all responses from people asked to name the car and truck advertising that first came to mind.

adWatch

That was the highest score yet for Ford, which has led the category every month. Ford's increase was the largest among all advertisers mentioned by respondents in the May survey.

Ford last month broke a new tv campaign for its new compact Tempo, in which commercials open and close with shots of the car being driven inside the "O" of a giant Tempo sign (AA, May 16). In addition, Ford in recent months has been heavily advertising its new Thunderbird, Bronco II sport-utility vehicle and Mus-

AGB seeks $$ for tv rating test

By JACK HONOMICHL

New York—AGB Research, the British marketing research conglomerate that has visions of setting up a national tv audience measurement panel, is asking networks and advertisers for "somewhat less than $1 million" in seed money to support a six-month pilot project.

Heading the AGB tv effort with the so-called "people meters" in the U.S. is Richard J.C. Hallwood, a director of Audits of Great Britain Ltd., who last week approached research executives at all three tv networks—CBS, ABC and NBC—and the Cable Advertising Bureau seeking support for the pilot study.

In a few weeks, at the suggestion of the network people, Mr. Hallwood says he will approach some major tv advertisers to seek their support, too.

The tentative site for AGB's pilot, should it be funded, is Atlanta. Mr. Hallwood says he has had a couple of meetings with Ted Turner, chairman of Atlanta-based Turner Broadcasting System. As for funding support from Mr. Turner, Mr. Hallwood says, "We haven't discussed it with him yet."

The pilot, which would take about four months to set up and six to produce data via a metered panel, would test two data collection technologies: The AGB people meter, which Mr. Hallwood said will go on-line in the U.K. in 1984, and a so-called "electronic diary."

The electronic diary enables respondents to enter viewing and demographic data via a laser wand onto a board set up for displaying date, quarter-hour segments, number of viewers (including guests), etc.

"I personally think this will be one else has in any single athlete—in terms of how we are going to present Pete to corporations," says Michael Trager, president of Landau's international sports division.

In brief, Landau wants Pete Rose to make big money from his pursuit of Ty Cobb's 50-year-old record by embedding his image in the minds of the public and corporate America during—and for long after—the quest. In return for its efforts— which began more than a year ago for an event that is still more than a year off—Landau will get an undisclosed percentage of the revenues Mr. Rose receives for endorsing products and services.

Landau obviously expects the Phillies star to be much in demand. Industry sources say it is asking a minimum of $250,000 for a one-year agreement by Mr. Rose to appear in national commercials, which is at least double the going rate for name athletes.

Catherine Gordon, a Landau account exec, won't confirm the number but says it was "not far" from the base figure being quoted —with the price escalating from there depending on what services are wanted from the Phillies star.

Rival agents, who may be a tiny bit envious, are both outraged and perplexed. Some say the Landau-devised blitz touting Mr. Rose is nothing less than a marketing version of "Charlie Hustle's" well-known steamrolling over any opponent who dares get in his way.

Some also say the plan is fraught with risk. They say Mr. Rose's exploits next summer will be eclipsed by the Summer Olympic Games, that there is always a chance that he won't set the record because of injury or the further ravages of time (the 42-year-old Mr. Rose has been benched a number of games this season) or that the American public just may not care that much.

"I don't think corporations are going to get involved with Pete because of this event," says one agent who asked not to be named. "I'm not sure if America is going to be on the edge of its seat waiting to see if Pete breaks the record.

"You cannot use these techniques to persuade a company," the agent continues. "There are too many people involved in a decision. You can't sprinkle salt on the clouds; it either rains or it doesn't."

There is also the matter of asking price. "No company in its right mind is going to pay that kind of money when they could get Tom Seaver for $75,000 or Jim Palmer for $75,000," says another agent of the $250,000 price apparently established for Mr. Rose.

"If there is one person in baseball now that represents the biggest thing that is going to happen to the game during the next two years it's going to be Pete Rose," Mr. Trager counters. He concedes that the 1984 Summer Olympics will claim the public's attention, but he believes the effect will be short-term. "There will be a couple of weeks that summer where nobody is going to focus on anything except the Olympics. But based on the way Pete is going, we expect him to break the record after the games, in late August or September." (Through last Thursday, Mr. Rose had 3,923 hits—269 shy of the record.)

Nor does the reaction to the high price tag put on Mr. Rose bother Mr. Trager. "When Los Angeles started to market the Olympics they threw out these huge numbers," he says. "Everyone said they were out of their minds. Now they have about $130 million in marketing commitments from major corporations who want to be associated with this three-week event."

Ms. Gordon, the Landau account exec, adds that the agency didn't pick the numbers arbitrarily. She says Landau spent much of 1982 testing the market through contacts at "various" corporations, and that it also surveyed the general public to determine how well known Mr. Rose is.

Mr. Rose is the only athlete Landau has ever represented on a full-time basis. (It also represents Los Angeles Lakers basketball star Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, but only for deals with Japanese companies.) "This is not a chance thing," Ms. Gordon says. "The record he is approaching is something special—we do not want to get into a situation where we are representing athletes across the board."

Landau is no stranger to sports marketing, however. Mr. Trager, a former NBC-TV vp, is the man who put the ABC-United States Football League tv package together. Landau also is the marketing agency for the USFL, the 1984 Winter Olympics and the Breeders Cup horse races. Ms. Gordon spent five years handling the Harlem Globetrotters' marketing program.

The current selling of Pete Rose began in March, 1982, when his attorney, Reuven Katz, hired Landau Associates. What he wanted to do, Mr. Katz says, was construct a plan that would chart Mr. Rose's entire career from the period in which he approaches the record through his life after baseball.

Underlying the effort, Mr. Katz says, was his feeling that Mr. Rose —for all his baseball accomplishments—has not been marketed properly. He also points out that the people behind the Atlanta Braves' Henry Aaron had no detailed marketing plan for Mr. Aaron as he pursued Babe Ruth's lifetime home run record and that they now probably regret that fact.

It wasn't the missed opportunities that bothered Mr. Katz as much as the piecemeal approach, for it had left Mr. Rose devoid of an image that the corporate community could focus upon. Part of the problem was Mr. Rose himself; he is an extremely outgoing and friendly person who may be, if anything, too accessible.

"Over the years if anyone had come up to Pete and said 'Pete, I have a deal for you' he would say, 'Fine, let's talk.' Consequently I would have as many as 20 people feeding me deals at once," Mr. Katz says. He would then sit down with Mr. Rose and choose.

Yes, the catch-as-catch-can method did pull in sizable national deals to do commercials for Beecham Products' Aqua Velva and Combe Inc.'s Grecian Formula, but what was missing was a coordinated marketing program. This lack could cost Pete Rose dearly as he closed in on the Ty Cobb record, Mr. Katz felt.

"I became particularly uncomfortable as Pete came to this period in his life where we were looking toward a momentous record," Mr. Katz says. "It wasn't just the record. It's Pete the person and what he was going to represent in this period leading up to the record. After the record is broken, he will become a person of a different stature with opportunities and responsibilities that go along with that."

Hence the search for an experienced agency to put a total marketing plan together. Mr. Katz says he examined a number of agencies before settling on Landau.

Landau has attempted to construct an image of Pete Rose that is a composite of many things the public already knows about him, and some that it may not know, such as his work with the American Diabetes Assn. and Big Brothers of America. He is portrayed as a man who does not possess the greatest physical talents but who has used what he has not only to excel himself but to motivate others to do so.

The key element of the selling effort is a nine-minute film that climaxes with the emotional depiction of the day Mr. Rose gets that 4,192nd hit. The film includes testimonials by Fran Tarkenton and Phyllis George as well as by Kyle Craig, senior vp-marketing, Burger King, who tells how Pete Rose's accomplishments were used in an in-house motivation film when the company launched its "battle of the burgers" advertising campaign.

It also shows another side of Mr. Rose: "Pete looks great in a coat and tie and can play the corporate role as well. I think that's a little known part of him," says Ms. Gordon.

The film is accompanied by a detailed proposal outlining the ways corporations can cash in on Mr. Rose's fame and by a slick six-page brochure that also describes the big moment: "...the stadium seems to gasp as one and then explodes. The scoreboard erupts...There is jubilant celebration as Peter Edward Rose tips his cap to his fans, and to the world."

The whole show goes on the road soon; Landau sees the next three to six months as the right time for its pitch. "It's tough to get folks in marketing and advertising departments to commit to anything this early," Landau's Mr. Trager concedes. "But when they begin to focus in on next year we will be a part of their memory."

Whether corporations buy the pitch seems almost secondary to Mr. Katz, the ballplayer's attorney; he's just happy that the all-out, coordinated attempt to sell Mr. Rose has finally been undertaken.

"This might not be successful financially for Pete but it's going to be done well," he says. "That's all that I care about at this point in his career. Now I know whatever happens it won't be cheapened by a bunch of promotions that make no sense."#

Have you seen a Ford ad lately?

tang convertible.

May's results probably reflect the cumulative effect of the advertising for those products as well as the new Tempo campaign, according to Joseph Schulte, general manager of the Dearborn, Mich., office of J. Walter Thompson USA, agency for Ford. He said the adWatch results confirm his agency's own research, particularly in regard to Tempo.

"We're pleased, but not surprised," Mr. Schulte said. Tempo advertising "was specifically designed to build awareness for the product," he said, "and all of our pretests indicated that that would in fact happen." Mr. Schulte also noted that all Ford division advertising now uses the "Have you driven a Ford ..lately" tag line, which he said has proven to be very effective.

Chevrolet was No. 2 in May, for the 11th time in 14 months, with a score of 9.4%, up slightly from 8.6% in April. Ford's May margin of 11.9 points over Chevrolet was its widest yet; Ford's lead was as narrow as 1.2 points last November.

Toyota again was No. 3 in the category, with 6.7% of all May mentions, up from 5.6% in April. Ford, Chevrolet and Toyota have ranked Nos. 1 through 3 every month; Toyota has edged out Chevrolet for the No. 2 spot three times.

AdWatch is a joint project of Advertising Age and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. Ad awareness is measured by asking a national random sample of consumers to identify the advertising that first comes to mind of all seen or heard in the previous 30 days for each of 20 categories. Last month, 1,250 people were questioned by telephone from May 1 through May 21. Under adWatch methodology, an increase or decrease of 2.8 percentage points indicates a statistically significant change—one attributable to more than variations in the sample itself.

In the fast-food category, McDonald's suffered a 7.5-point decline in awareness last month, to 42.3% of all responses from 49.8% in April. That was its second-steepest drop, topped only by a 15.7-point decline last October, when Burger King launched its hard-hitting comparative compaign.

Unlike the pattern of previous months, when a rise or fall for McDonald's was accompanied by a Burger King move in the opposite direction, Burger King held steady with a score of 16.3%, versus 16.2% in April. Burger King phased out its "broiling versus frying" ads in the middle of last month, at roughly the same time McDonald's began airing commercials that tout its No. 1 ranking in fast-food sales, the 11 million people served daily and its array of products.

In other categories last month:

- Marlboro reclaimed the top spot in tobacco products, with a 3.2-point rise to 9.4%, its second-best adWatch score. Marlboro had relinquished its No. 1 position for the first time in April, when Kool jumped 4.1 points to 6.2%. Kool fell a significant 4.6 points in May, to just 1.5% and No. 9 in the category. Skoal was No. 2 with a score of 4.2%, and Winston No. 3 with a score of 3.4%.
- Birds Eye and Green Giant remained No. 1 and No. 2, respectively, in frozen foods, but Birds Eye expanded its lead considerably with a 4.1-point increase to 14.4% of all responses, while Green Giant slumped 3.9 points to 5.8%.
- In coffee & tea, Sanka's awareness was nearly halved, to 5.5% from 10.1%, and its advertising fell to No. 4 in awareness from No. 3. Folger's repeated as category leader with 20.5% of responses, followed by Maxwell House with 15.9% and Lipton with 8.5%.
- Tylenol remained No. 1 in medicine & drugs by a substantial margin, but fell 5.9 points to 33.8%. Anacin again was No. 2 with 5.4%, up from 3.9%, and Bayer repeated as No. 3 with 4.3%, up from 2.6%.
- In home electronics, No. 2 Apple fell 3.5 points to 4.5%. Atari remained No. 1 with 16.3%, up from 13.6%, and Texas Instruments again was No. 3 with 3.2%, down from 4.3%.
- There were no significant moves in soft drinks, which may in itself be significant, as Pepsi-Cola again failed to show an appreciable awareness lift from a new campaign launched several months ago. It remained No. 2 in the category with a score of 20.8%, up slightly from 19.7%. Coca-Cola was No. 1 for the sixth straight month with a score of 25.7%, down from 28.6%. 7UP, which had lost the No. 3 spot to Diet Coke in February and March, was No. 3 in May for the second straight month with a score of 6.7%, up from 5.2%.#

Department stores lead newspaper ad spending

New York—Department stores spent $67.2 million on newspaper advertisements in March, a 26% increase over the same period a year ago and the largest single investment among 16 advertising categories surveyed that month.

Other categories showing gains in March were radio, tv, phonographs and records, up 30% to $10.6 million; food stores, up 27% to $25.2 million, and soft-drink beverages, up 70% to $575,000. Over-all, eight of the 16 categories registered increases for the month. The biggest declines were from cameras and photo supplies, down 40% to $325,800, and cosmetics, makeup and manicure products, down 26% to $220,700.

Bank takes shot at money fund ads

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

An Arizona bank has counterattacked the Investment Company Institute's ad campaign on behalf of money market mutual funds (AA, June 6), using print ads that borrow some of the institute's tactics.

Headlined, "Carrot shtick," the ads for Phoenix-based United Bank not only ask the question, "Who's kidding who, money funds?" but also reproduce the institute's Doyle Dane Bernbach-created ad that features a dangling carrot.

The carrot in the institute's ad represents the lure of high interest rates that the institute claims the bank money funds initially offered the public in order to woo them from the money market mutuals.

United Bank's copy maintains that the money funds can't beat United's money market account rates and that money fund checks are difficult to cash because they are often from an out-of-state bank. One line says of the money markets' mutual funds: "But since they don't have a rate to stand on, they would be better off saying nothing. . .which they are."

Tom Dynjan, general manager of Owens & Associates, agency for United Bank, said it was not the bank's intention to use the ads as a direct response to the institute's campaign but rather to "protect our own investment in the product and in the assets the bank has gotten."

While calling the institute's advertising powerful, he said ads such as one headlined, "the Atlanta Sting," which detailed how Atlanta banks failed to fulfill some of their advertised promises, represented an unfair indictment by the institute of the banking industry.

"They are stretching it a bit when they run an ad about the Atlanta sting in Phoenix," he said. "It has nothing to do with what's going on here."

However, Mr. Dynjan said the agency's research showed that people primarily were interested in interest rates and that insurance and other features being promoted by bank money funds would not hold investors.

"It is interesting to me that more banks are not coming back at the money funds in their ads," he said. "You would think they would want to protect what they have gained."#

New Kikkoman Lite cuts salt content in soy sauce

San Francisco—Kikkoman International is out with a reduced-salt version of its No. 1 soy sauce, a product it hopes will find a following among the growing number of health-conscious consumers.

Kikkoman Lite contains 43% less salt than naturally brewed Kikkoman soy sauce and more than 50% less than its LaChoy and Chun King brand competitors, but it is comparable in flavor to its full-strength counterpart, the company claims.

Ads backing the July national introduction say, "We cut the salt, not the flavor." Grey Advertising, San Francisco, is the agency.

Kikkoman hopes to expand the market for the oriental seasoning among consumers who shy away from it because of its high sodium content.

The company doesn't intend that Kikkoman Lite will reduce sales of its regular soy sauce, which has a 45% share of the U.S. soy sauce market.

Kikkoman is concentrating its ad spending in magazines such as American Health, Prevention and Weight Watchers.#

To our readers

Picture, if you will, a young blonde woman whose desk is piled high with galleys, hastily scribbled notes to herself that only she can decipher; reference books about broadcasting, cable, newspapers; stacks of chart material, and folders full of story ideas.

That sometimes frazzled but ever really in control woman is Sarah Stiansen, ADVERTISING AGE profile issues editor and the one ultimately responsible for this week's "100 Leading Media Companies" issue.

Sarah joined the Magazine staff "unofficially" just a year ago, shortly after graduating from the University of Michigan with a degree in English literature. She was looking for work, and she said one of her strong points was "interpreting confused language and simplifying jargon."

Sarah was just what we were looking for because we were just finishing our second 100 Leading Media Companies and were beginning to work on our "100 Leading National Advertisers" issue. We needed someone to help us sort through the mass of assignments, and, as copy trickled and then poured in, someone to help edit the profiles.

Sarah joined the Magazine officially as a fulltime staffer Jan. 1, 1983, and we're not sure how we ever did without her.

As profile issues editor, Sarah oversees gathering numbers, making writing assignments for profiles and features and editing the material that appears in our various "profile" issues: Agency Income, Leading Media Companies, 100 Leading Advertisers and 100 Top Markets.

One of the parts we like best about putting together a profile issue is searching out people and subjects to devote to the short features articles that are scattered throughout the issues.

We began including these features when we created the first 100 Leading Media Companies issue, published in December, 1981. The idea was so successful we began to translate the formula to the other profile issues.

Ideas for these stores originate in a variety of ways. Many result from phone calls made while we are researching and editing profiles. For example, the idea for the piece on the Journal Co.'s WTMJ-TV, Milwaukee, Page M-59, was sparked by a small item in a reference book.

Sometimes our plans don't work out the way we'd like them to, though. For example, two of the more interesting women in publishing are Oveta Culp Hobby, chairman and editor of H&C Communications, which publishes the Houston Post, and Helen Copley, publisher of Copley Newspapers, who took over the reins of their respective papers after the deaths of their husbands.

We thought articles on both women would offer some insights into the newspaper business and would make appealing reading. Unfortunately, both declined to be interviewed for our issue.

It would be unfair to single out any one person who devoted so many hours to preparing this reference issue. The profiles were researched and written by ADVERTISING AGE reporters and editors in all our bureaus, and Magazine staff members wrote and edited profiles and proofread galleys.

All in all, many people contributed many long hours and a great deal of effort to this issue. I want to thank them all.

A namby pamby?

If James Brady hadn't had to preen over his very own white dinner jacket, who knows how many more than the 60 names he managed to drop—or better, list—he might have inflated himself with in his column, "The birthday party" (June 6).

What a namby-pamby James Brady seems, with the arms of his sweater casually thrown over his shoulders so he can hug himself. Is this Brady a man who "grabs" a scotch, as he puts it? I think not.

Now that summer's on its way, we will be spotting him puffing himself up in the oh, so trendy watering hole of the moment, his sunglasses clamped on the top of his curls like a headband . . . "Well, surely you read my last column in which I point out that . . . ," chattering on about Southampton and some cunning little cafe he found in an apparently abandoned drainage pipe that only he and George Plimpton know about. Or care about.

Couldn't you trade him to a cosmetics magazine or something and get someone else for us and a hundred dollars? At least, charge him for the space he abuses to reassure himself.

For the record

The special report on Suburban Media (May 30) was an excellent effort. Please accept my sincere thanks for allowing Suburban Newspapers of America to be represented by my article.

When my department heads read the story, however, they were somewhat chagrined by the explanation of my background. Our free newspapers are, in fact, newspapers. Our editorial staff of 11 people felt that the proper attribution of our organization should have been free newspapers, not shoppers.

Contempt for the doers

Anyone who read Ayn Rand's "Atlas Shrugged"—and understood it—could understand Mr. Mahoney's motivation ("The battling maverick as corporate chieftain," May 23).

My rage is for each bloodsucker who backstabbed him anonymously. Blood: The essence of life. Bloodsucker: A person who extorts or takes from others as much as he can get.

These people feed off of the strength and accomplishments of the "doers." Instead of respect or appreciation for those who put money in their pockets, they feel contempt. And it makes me sick (disgusted by reason of excess). These people would be wise to "check their premises."

Critical of our Critic

Can you stand a little criticism of your Critic's Corner column? Your Critic's approach to the Ford ad in the May 16, Magazine is ridiculous!

What your Critic complained about was the starkness of the photography, which may be true. But, because of the striking image of a giant man towering over a car on a lift, who cares?

How to hold a $600 car repair down to $25.

Ford Extended Service Plan

When I saw that ad in a magazine, I had to linger over it for a while. I'm sure many other people did, too. To me it did more than most ads do, it captured my interest. Picking it apart by pretending that there are no such things as context and purpose is useless.

My only beef with that ad was that there was no highlighting of any of the copy in the text. But, as far as attracting attention, it works. Your Critic's argument didn't.

Despite clouds, revenue gains follow the leaders

By Joseph M. Winski

For most of the nation's largest media companies, 1982 was the year for riding out a recession and simultaneously—in many cases because of the recession—asking tough questions about strategy.

Are new cable franchises worth bidding for? Is pay tv a bad business?

How does a newspaper respond to a competing "total market coverage" program for advertisers, or implement one of its own? Is USA Today really an "extra buy" for readers, or will they drop the local daily? Are short stories and big graphics the wave of the future? How can magazines exploit the falloff in network tv viewing?

In general, media companies handled the immediate concern—the recession—surprisingly well, at least in terms of revenue growth. Sixty-three of the 100 media companies in Advertising Age's third ranking posted double-digit revenue gains last year—and 29 of them racked up increases of more than 20%. Only five suffered decreases in revenue last year—and two of these were largely because of the sale of some media properties.

The Advertising Age 100 Leading Media Companies as a whole managed a 13% gain in revenues from media operations last year, the same percentage gain achieved in 1981. The wounds to profitability may have been more serious than in 1981; there nonetheless was a marked uplift in the optimism of media executives in 1983 compared with a year earlier.

And if anything, companies in the "old media" are more optimistic than the newer cable companies that were so hopeful last year. "We have learned a lot from the recession," Steve Sturm, director-newspaper development at Lee Enterprises (No. 58 on the list) told our reporter, "and more than ever we are bullish on newspapers."

Some companies were not forced to face the tough strategy questions, largely because they appear to have considered them carefully before. Most notable here may be Time Inc., whose twin-pronged emphasis on consumer magazines and video—most notably Home Box Office, its pay cable network, and cable system operator American Television & Communications—enabled it to make the most significant move among the top 10 media companies. Its 21% jump in revenues helped it supplant RCA Corp. (parent of National Broadcasting Co.) as the third largest media company. It marked the first time in the three years of our survey that someone other than the companies that own the three major tv networks were the top three.

Gannett Co., whose strategy involves eschewing cable and betting heavily on newspapers—as vividly underscored by its introduction of USA Today—made the only other climb in the top 10. It moved up to No. 5 from No. 6, with a 10.4% media revenue gain, edging out Times Mirror Co., which dropped to No. 6 despite an 8.8% revenue increase.

American Broadcasting Cos. repeated as the largest media company, as its revenues increased 10% to $2.53 billion. CBS Inc., with a 12% rise, again was No. 2. Time, RCA and Gannett were followed by the same companies that ranked 7 through 10 in 1981: S.I. Newhouse & Sons, Knight-Ridder Newspapers, Hearst Corp. and Tribune Co.

As was the case the previous two years, the top 10 media companies were the only ones who topped the billion dollar mark in media revenues. They accounted for 45% of the $37.2 billion in media revenues of all 100 companies on our list. But again the increase of the top 10 companies as a group—10.6%—was less than the 13% increase of all 100 companies.

Westinghouse Electric Co., which benefited from a full year's ownership of cable operator Teleprompter, posted the largest percentage increase, more than doubling media revenues to an estimated $663 million. It leaped eight places in the rankings, to No. 16 from No. 24.

Other big gainers included Allbritton Communications Co., up 84% to $93 million and to No. 85 from unranked in 1981; General Tire and Rubber (RKO General), up 79% to $288.2 million and to No. 30 from No. 50; Tele-Communications up 98% to $265.6 million and to No. 33 from No. 48, and Turner Broadcasting System, up 76% to $146.3 million and to No. 61 from No. 82.

By virtue of Warner Amex, their joint venture, both Warner Communications (No. 50) and American Express Co. (No. 52) also managed impressive revenue gains last year, of 66% and 55%, respectively. However, as was the case for a number of other companies heavily into cable, the revenue gains masked some serious profit problems. Warner Amex lost $46.6 million last year.

Warner Amex was hardly alone in hurting from the heavy costs involved in winning and building cable franchises. Storer Communications (No. 22), United Cable Television Corp. (No. 81), Continental Cablevision (No. 77) and Sammons Communications (No. 93) are also cooling their pursuit of new franchises. "We are not actively franchising," said a Sammons spokesman, adding that the entire process has become much too costly and unrewarding.

Expectations also were lowered in some quarters for certain pay tv programing efforts. Westinghouse Broadcasting & Cable scrapped plans to be a partner in the Disney Channel with Walt Disney Productions and also sold its half interest in Showtime, the pay tv network, to Viacom International.

More recently, the Justice Department said it would block, on antitrust grounds, a proposed merger of Showtime and the Movie Channel that was designed to compete with HBO.

Some companies are seeing improved profits from cable, either as system operators or programing providers. For example, Multimedia Inc. (No. 42) said its cable division's operating profits rose 74%, and Capital Cities Communications (No. 15) said its cable division broke into the black last year. And Turner Broadcasting, which had been absorbing heavy losses in cable programing offered via superstation WTBS and Cable News Network, said it will post an operating profit this year.

In an effort to operate more efficiently, cable system operators increasingly are adopting a "clustering" strategy, in which new cable franchises are sought only if they are adjacent to existing ones. Time Inc.'s American Television & Communications, for example, says this approach makes it more economical to advertise for potential subscribers and also gives advertisers larger, less fragmented markets. An offshoot of the clustering strategy is an increase in swapping, in which companies trade isolated systems for systems contiguous to other markets where they operate.

Operating over-the-air subscription tv stations emerged as a big question mark in 1982. Oak Industries (No. 65), once a Wall Street favorite for its aggressive marketing of pay tv subscriptions, saw subscriber growth slow and disconnections rise substantially last year, leading to the cessation of ON TV operations in Phoenix and Dallas. These and other developments reduced Oak Industries' net income to just $4.1 million last year from $30.3 million in 1981.

Even Time Inc. is taking some lumps here; its pay tv stations in Dallas, Cleveland and Boston lost money last year, and it sold the Dallas operation in September.

In the print media, some traditionally powerful flagships weakened last year. At McGraw-Hill (No. 12) ad pages at BusinessWeek fell 10%. The National Geographic Society's (No. 51) National Geographic had one of its worst years in a long time, suffering a 33% dip in ad pages and a 23% drop in ad revenues. Times Mirror's Los Angeles Times suffered a 23% decline in classified advertising linage and instituted stringent cost cutting.

Reader's Digest also had a bad year, one of the results of which was the magazine industry's most aggressive promotional effort to capitalize on decreased network tv watching. The campaign, based on research showing that, unlike network tv viewing, magazine readership doesn't decline when cable enters a market, has been picked up the Magazine Publishers Assn.

Richard McLoughlin, Digest publisher, said the findings could have a significant positive effect on general magazines within five years.

Over-all, the bright news seemed to outweigh the bad for print media last year, especially as newspapers and magazines realized that they had weathered the worst of the economic slowdown. One indication of fundamental optimism is the number of ambitious new magazine launches recently, including Time Inc's TV-Cable Week, S.I. Newhouse's revamped Vanity Fair and Spring magazine from Rodale Press, which made it to No. 100 on our list. And in a noteworthy newspaper development Tribune Co. claimed its New York Daily News, once near extinction, was turning around and could be making money by the end of this year.

Aside from the general economy, newspaper concerns seemed to focus on the possible impact of Gannett's flashy USA Today, which already has prompted a substantial increase in the use of color graphics by many dailies.

The concept of "total market coverage," introduced in markets such as Seattle by free weekly shoppers, also is drawing increased attention, as papers either react to a "TMC" invader or try to preempt one with their own versions.

Newcomers to our list in addition to Allbritton Communications and Rodale Press are Dispatch Printing Co. (No. 68), Ingersoll Newspapers Co. (No. 84), Maclean Hunter Communications (No. 95) and Cosmos Broadcasting Corp. (No. 98).

Dropping from the list were Charter Co., which was No. 38 in 1982 but has sold off its media operations, Post Corp. (No. 88 last year), CSX Corp. (97), Schurz Communications (98), Christian Science Publishing Society (99) and Stauffer Communications (100).

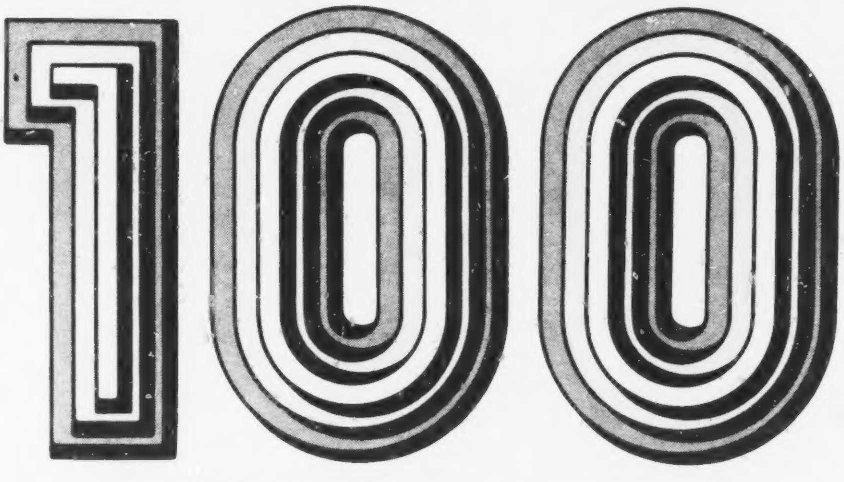
The ups and downs of media's big time



A.S. Abell Co.

A.S. Abell Co., Baltimore, is the country's 48th largest media company, with operation revenues of about $185.0 million in 1982, in all media. In 1981, its media revenues were $133.0 million.

The revenues stem from two properties: A.S. Abell Publishing, which accounted for about 68% of the total, and A.S. Abell Communications. Abell's principal property remains the Baltimore Sunpapers, the morning, evening and Sunday papers, but A.S. Abell Communications is the fastest growing part of the company. The company's broadcast revenues doubled in the past year because of an aggressive acquisition program.

The privately held company acquired WCRJ (am, fm) in Jacksonville, Fla., for $2 million and it also purchased WNVZ (am, fm) in Norfolk, Va., for $1.9 million. Finally, WDOX-FM in Daytona, Fla., was purchased for $2.8 million. The company continues to own WMAR-TV, the NBC affiliate in Baltimore, but it sold WBOC-TV and WBOC-AM and FM in Salisbury, Md. No sale price was available; the transaction was part of a larger package that included an industrial park and printing facility.

Steve Seymour, the chief executive officer of A.S. Abell Communications, said the company's objective is to have seven fm stations, the maximum allowed by the Federal Communications Commission. Including WRLX-FM, Baltimore, the company now has four.

The sale of WBOC-TV left Abell with just one tv station, but Mr. Seymour said more acquisitions are planned for late 1983 or early 1984. Mr. Seymour wouldn't say what the criteria are for new tv acquisitions "except that like everyone else we're looking for undervalued properties in growth markets."

Another new venture of A.S. Abell in 1982 was its first syndicated tv program, "Jack Anderson's Confidential." The show was seen in 70 markets, including eight of the top 10 and 16 of the top 20.

Mr. Seymour said expansion of Travelcom is also planned. Travelcom delivers advertising to tv sets in more than 12,000 hotel rooms in Baltimore and Washington.

Abell Publishing has also been busy in the past year, acquiring the regional Country magazine. Abell inherited a circulation of just 35,000, but it expects that figure to be doubled this year, thanks to a massive mailing.

Meanwhile, the Sunpapers have added more circulation and a brighter look. New offset presses have allowed the Sunday Baltimore Sun to put color on all 12 section fronts. Peter Stegner, who became advertising director in October, said use of color wasn't provoked by Gannett's USA Today, "although they hurried us up a bit." Mr. Stegner joined the company from Gannett's Rochester Times-Union.

The morning and afternoon Baltimore Suns have a combined circulation of 347,956 (March, 1983, Audit Bureau of Circulations figures) and the Sunday Sun's official circulation was 380,068. But since January, 1982 the Sunday Sun has had a circulation of more than 400,000, a fact stressed in a recent promotional campaign.

The newspapers are focusing circulation efforts in the suburbs between Washington and Baltimore—suburbs also coveted by the Washington Post. Those who don't subscribe to the papers may still be reached through the Sun's shared-mail advertising. That project, planned for an August start, allows advertisers to reach six different zones, each of which is further divided into three or four sub-zones.

In the more distant future, Abell's most ambitious project could be Viewtron, a service that would use telephones and tvs to deliver a broad variety of information and services to homes. Abell is working with Knight-Ridder Newspapers on the project. Knight-Ridder plans to launch Viewtron in south Florida in September; the target date for Viewtron in the Baltimore-Washington area is late 1985.

Patricia McCarthy, the director of the Viewtron project, said that some information from the Baltimore Sun would be available on Viewtron. But, she said, Viewtron is ideal for delivering "micro-news": Information more specific and often more timely than what is available in newspapers.

In addition, Viewtron would be a two-way system. It could be used to buy groceries, pay bills and shop from catalogs. Ms. McCarthy said Knight-Ridder's research shows that Viewtron's main appeal would be to affluent consumers—a fact assured by its price alone. Although Viewtron uses existing phones and tvs, the gear needed to hook it up costs $595. The monthly service fee is $12.

Affiliated Publications

Affiliated Publications, Boston, is the 34th largest media company. Media revenues for 1982 were $259.0 million, or 99% of total revenues of $259.4 million. Media revenues were up 9.9% from the previous year's restated figure of $235.8 million, or 99% of $236.1 million in total revenues.

The Boston Globe accounted for $244.2 million (up 10.2%), and broadcast operations contributed $14.8 million to the total revenues.

The Globe is distributed throughout New England, with the five-county Boston area being the primary market for the newspaper. Audit Bureau of Circulations figures for 1982 show the daily at 510,978 copies and the Sunday edition at 750,308 copies. These numbers show a gain from 1981 of 6,486 copies daily and 9,591 copies on Sunday.

Advertising linage—66,536,765 lines—was down 2.7% for 1982. National advertising linage dropped 1.1%. "The loss was due primarily to a cutback in advertising by tobacco companies," the company said. Retail advertising linage increased, showing a gain last year of 1.3%. Despite the poor economy, classified advertising was surprisingly strong, with an over-all loss of only 6.1%. It is expected that classified help-wanted ads will show improvement through 1983.

Affiliated has a joint 45% interest in McCaw Communications Cos., a multiple system operator in Bellevue, Wash. The joint venture cable operation is now serving more than 102,000 basic subscribers. Cable systems were acquired in North Bend, Granger, Sunnyside, Grandview and Prosser (all in Washington) and in Juneau, Alaska. Affiliated formed a joint venture with McCaw in Southern Oregon to own and operate cable tv systems in Medford, Grants Pass, Roseburg and Klamath Falls.

McCaw's radio common carrier division sells and services telephones and pagers. It expanded during 1982, and McCaw predicts this technology will be one of the fastest growing segments of the telecommunications industry.

In June, McCaw Cellular Communications, a subsidiary of McCaw Communications Cos., filed applications with the Federal Communications Commission for cellular radio telephone franchises in six cities. In December, it filed for franchises in five more cities; in March, 1983, it filed for licenses in 14 other major markets.

Affiliated said that operating income at its broadcast stations was down in 1982 because of general weakness in the national and local economies. Affiliated Broadcasting expects improvement in revenues and operating profits in 1983.

Several building programs started in 1981 progressed last year. The satellite printing plant in Billerica, Mass., is targeted to go into operation in the spring of 1984. A 55,000-sq.-ft. office addition to the Globe's main plant in Dorchester, Mass., will be completed in the fall of 1983. Offices for the purpose of studying the feasibility of establishing a videotex information system in New England were opened in Newton, Mass.

Effective Jan. 1, 1982, William O. Taylor became chairman of Affiliated and chief executive officer and publisher of the Boston Globe. John P. Giuggio became president and chief operating officer at Affiliated and president of the Boston Globe. Arthur F.

Allbritton Communications

Allbritton Communications Co., Washington, the nation's 85th largest media company, is a new entry to the listing of top media companies, with revenues estimated at $93.0 million in 1982, all in media. This represented an increase of 84% over estimated media revenues of $50.5 million in 1981.

Growth at Allbritton began in October, 1981, when owner Joe L. Allbritton purchased the Trenton Times from the Washington Post Co., and is continuing at rapid pace with the recent acquisition of KATV-TV in Little Rock and KTUL-TV in Tulsa. The media company now has six newspapers and five vhf stations.

Prior to the acquisitions, the composition of Allbritton Communications had changed very little since Mr. Allbritton sold the Washington Star to Time Inc. in 1978, but kept the other media properties. Time Inc. ultimately folded the Star in 1981 after attempting to sell it.

Purchase of the Trenton Times and Sunday Times-Advertiser, which are operating in the black, according to an Allbritton official, brings revenues estimated at $39 million into the company.

The two new tv properties, purchased for $80 million from Leake TV Inc. of Muskogee, Okla.—approved by the Federal Communications Commission this April—are expected together to generate in 1983 about $23 million in revenues after agency commission, says Thomas B. Cookerly, president of the broadcast division at Allbritton.

The two stations, both ABC affiliates, are leaders in their respective and growing markets. Allbritton's broadcast property flagship, however, remains station WJLA-TV, the ABC affiliate in Washington, which is locked in a perpetual struggle with affiliates of other networks for the top share in that five-station market.

Other tv properties include another ABC affiliate, WSET-TV in Lynchburg, Va., NBC affiliate WCIV-TV in Charleston, S.C., and radio property KRKR (am) and KFKF (fm) in Kansas City, Kan., which until recently used the call letters KCKN am, fm. Broadcast, without the contribution of the new acquisitions, represented about 43% of total media revenues in 1982.

Newspaper properties include two papers in Massachusetts, the Westfield News, a daily with circulation of 6,938 in 1982, and Amherst Morning Record; three in New Jersey, the Paterson News with 48,098 daily circulation and 46,709 for its weekend edition, the Trenton Times with daily circulation of 66,328 and a circulation of 78,563 for the Sunday Times-Advertiser, and the 38,057-circulated daily Union City Dispatch; and one paper in Pennsylvania, the Irwin Standard-Observer, a 13,443-circulation daily.

Allbritton Communications, while fully a communications company, is part of the Allbritton-owned holding company, Perpetual Corp., which has interests in insurance and mortuaries.

American Broadcasting Cos.

American Broadcasting Cos., New York, is the largest media company in the U.S., with media revenues of $2.53 billion, or 95% of the total 1982 revenues of $2.66 billion. In 1981, its media revenues were $2.3 billion, or 94% of total revenues of $2.44 billion.

Its media interests include tv and radio networks and stations, consumer and business publications and several co-ventures in cable tv.

The majority of ABC's media revenues came from commercial tv and radio, which accounted for $2.3 billion in sales, up from $2.1 billion in 1981. Publishing operations delivered $255.4 million last year, down from $275.3 million in 1981; of those totals, $170.4 million last year and $187 million in 1981 were estimated to be in media, rather than books, manuals or records.

The company's No. 1 revenue source by far was the ABC-TV Network. ABC executives said the network posted record ad revenues and improved profits over 1981 levels, chiefly because of increased sponsor demand but also the gradual addition of commercial time to offset rising costs, and "stringent" cost controls. The network had record profits in the second and third quarters.

Any chance for record profits in the fourth quarter was lost when the National Football League Players Assn. called an eight-week strike. That forced ABC to cope with advertiser make-goods for "Monday Night Football" and reschedule movies that could have been used to better effect, and at more attractive ad rates, during other times during the tv season.

In the first quarter of 1983, ABC revenues rose 8% to $663.1 million but net income fell 43% to $13.9 million from $24.2 million the previous year (which included the gain from an investment tax credit refund). About $654.2 million of revenues came from media properties; tv, radio and publishing posted strong gains but nonbroadcast video operations increased losses. The "Winds of War" and "Thorn Birds" miniseries, though costly, increased the tv network's sales growth and profit margin in the first quarter.

ABC lost the 1982-83 prime time season in A.C. Nielsen Co. households ratings to CBS by five-tenths of a rating point, compared with nine-tenths of a point in the previous season and 1.6 points in 1980-81.

ABC executives emphasized that the network ranked first in prime time ratings in the important 18-to-49 bracket among both men and women.

ABC's ratings trend over the past three seasons is "one we obviously like," said John Severino, president, ABC Television. He said he was dissatisfied with ABC's performance on Thursday and Friday nights, however.

He also noted that "the NFL strike obviously hurt us in the first half of the season," while helping CBS "get off to a stronger start than they would have" had "Monday Night Football" opposed regular CBS series.

For 1983-84, Mr. Severino and Frederick Pierce, ABC president, predicts a strong seller's market for the advance selling period, when advertisers commit to long-term package purchases. Last year, the three networks signed nearly $2 billion in upfront ad commitments. Part of the executives' bullishness is attributable to ABC's prime time inventory, which is 20% presold, because of the Olympics and political advertising.

Prime time may deliver ABC's biggest audiences and largest revenue totals, but daytime is the network's most profitable daypart, industry sources agreed. Besides its continuing dominance in Monday-through-Friday daytime ratings, ABC is No. 1 in early morning with "Good Morning America." "General Hospital," "All My Children" and "One Life to Live" remained the daytime ratings powerhouses for ABC.

ABC's "World News Tonight" averaged a 12.1 homes rating for the same 29 weeks as the prime time season (through April 17), for the first time beating NBC, which had an 11.6 rating. CBS continued as the evening news leader with a 14.4 average. The only bad news for the news division came with the April axing of the late night "The Last Word" in favor of an expanded "Nightline."

ABC Sports' big events of 1984 will be the Winter and Summer Olympics, expected to produce $650 million or so in ad revenues. Commercial time on the winter games is virtually sold out, and about 80% of the summer games time is sold out.

ABC and its rival tv networks will see their sports rights payments rise considerably in the next six years, thanks to the $2 billion five-year National Football League contract and a hefty National Collegiate Athletic Assn. football pact, both signed last year, and to the $1.1 billion six-year agreement signed in April with Major League Baseball. ABC's share of the latter contract will be an estimated $575 million.

Costs also rose for the tv programing and the news divisions, largely because of the startup of "World News This Morning," "This Week with David Brinkley" and "The Last Word."

All told, ABC reported that its commitments to buy broadcast programing (encompassing series, tv and theatrical movies and sports coverage) topped $1.83 billion in 1982; 98% of it is payable as these programs are telecast in the next five years.

ABC's capital expenditures, chiefly for broadcast equipment, reached $116 million last year and could climb to $150 million to $200 million this year.

Another successful operation under the ABC Television umbrella is the owned tv stations group, which ABC said was the most profitable group in the U.S. last year. Its sales prowess owed to the heavy viewing by adults 18 to 49, an audience segment that tuned in to the five ABC o&o's in greater numbers than to any other station group.

The ABC Radio division reported that the 1,800-plus affiliates carrying its four original networks—Contemporary, Information, Entertainment and FM, plus the newer Direction and Rock networks—attracted a combined audience of 87.8 million listeners weekly last year. The newest networks, Direction and Rock, now have 150 and 60 affiliates respectively, ABC said. The division's new TalkRadio program service has attracted 50 stations since its May startup.

ABC Radio Enterprises early last year acquired Watermark Inc., which syndicates the weekly "American Top 40" with Casey Kasem, "Musical," "American Country Countdown" and other musical shows.

ABC Radio, as it prepared to meet the intensifying competition in radio networks and satellite services, acknowledged that related startup costs depressed profits during 1982, despite an increase in division revenues. Profits last year also were offset by write-downs related to the termination of the syndicated Superadio project.

ABC's radio networks also are converting to digital transmission, a system that will become fully operational by mid-1984. Almost 700 affiliates so far have said they will purchase earth station equipment enabling them to receive ABC programing via satellite.

ABC's owned radio outlets reported higher ad sales last year, despite format changes at the flagship WABC, New York, and KGO-FM, San Francisco. Both switched to all-talk, including the TalkRadio service. WABC was for many years the highest rated station in New York (and the U.S.) with a top 40 music format; today, few am stations in the U.S. offer rock music. ABC's WPLJ (fm), New York, claimed to be the most-listened-to fm rock station in the U.S. during 1982.

The still-young ABC Video Enterprises, consisting of non-broadcast video operations, continued to post substantial losses, although division executives pointed to growing acceptance among major advertisers.

In June, 1982, it began its third ad-supported cable service, Satellite News Channel, as a coventure with Group W Satellite Communications—and as a rival to the Cable News Network. Its two other cable services relying on advertiser support are Daytime and ARTS, both co-ventures with Hearst Corp. One coup for the Daytime women's service was the signing of Procter & Gamble as a program sponsor.

Still more projects are in the works at ABC Video: Telefirst (formerly Home View Network), due next year as a mixture of broadcast, pay tv and videocassette technology; Reserved Seat Video Productions (RSVP), a pay-per-view (ppv) sports coventure with Getty Oil and Entertainment Sports Programming Network, which began with a boxing package on May 20, and a pay-per-view project involving entertainment and information programing, with Cox Communications.

The RSVP event marked the first time a ppv program was sold to national advertisers. ESPN officials indicated that future RSVP specials also are likely to be boxing packages. The ABC/Cox project tested a 24-hour ppv movie service, called FirsTicket, in two California cities last fall "as the first phase of [this] joint venture's research," the company said.

Herb Granath, ABC Video Enterprises' president, admitted that his operation, which loses about $10 million a quarter and which showed pretax losses of more than $32 million last year, was a year behind "where we thought we would be, but we can still make our projections."

Should the government and courts uphold recent joint ventures between movie studios and pay cable services, he said, his division would move into that business as well. ABC was said to have been among those seeking an interest in Showtime, which later joined forces with The Movie Channel.

The ABC Publishing division, which publishes and distributes more than 100 special-interest publications, had "slightly" lower revenues last year, chiefly because of the phasing out of one unit early in 1982 and to a "recessionary slowdown" in advertiser activity. For the last three quarters the division's profits hit record levels.

ABC Publishing is divided into trade (including Chilton Co. and Hitchcock Publishing Co.), special interest (Los Angeles, Modern Photography, McCall's Needlework & Crafts), and agricultural (Miller Publishing and Farm Progress Publications) publications.

ABC Publishing will also be involved in the 1984 Olympics, publishing an official guide for the summer games.

Recent management changes were highlighted by Mr. Pierce's advancing to the corporation's presidency from executive vp. In succeeding Elton Rule, now ABC vice-chairman, Mr. Pierce is the heir-apparent to Leonard Goldenson, 77, ABC chairman and chief executive officer.

Mr. Severino last fall became the ABC Television president and shortly thereafter named Mark Mandala as president of the owned tv stations division, replacing Richard O'Leary, who resigned. Arthur I. Cohen was named president of Telefirst.

American Express Co.

American Express Co., New York, is the 52nd largest U.S. media company, with 1982 media revenues estimated by Advertising Age of $175.8 million, or 2% of total revenues of $8.09 billion.

Of Amex's media total, $153.8 million came from its 50% partnership with Warner Communications in cable tv operations. In 1981, its media revenues were $113.6 million, coming from magazines and its partnership with Warner Communications, or 2% of total revenues of $7.29 billion.

As an entity, the joint venture generated $307.6 million in revenues last year, while posting a net loss of $46.6 million. The Warner Amex partnership consists of Warner Amex Cable Communications, which constructs and operates cable systems that provide entertainment programing and other services to residential and commercial subscribers, and a sister company, Warner Amex Satellite Entertainment Corp., which produces and distributes programing via satellite to cable systems throughout the country. Warner Amex increased both its cable and satellite programing operations throughout 1982 and into the first half of this year, with total revenues of the joint venture up 74% from 1980.

The company's media operations also included two magazines, Travel & Leisure and Food & Wine.

Warner Amex continued to experience subscriber growth in all sections of its operations, and there are now more than 1.2 million basic subscribers in the 147 Warner Amex cable systems, the nation's sixth-largest cable-tv operation. The venture also includes 1.1 million pay cable customers.

Recent developments featured the debut of Warner Amex regional sports channels in Houston, Pittsburgh and Dallas, which will provide cable viewers with exclusive live coverage of local professional and college sports teams.

Despite increased media revenues over-all in 1982, American Express found the substantial cost of building and development of new Warner Amex cable systems and the creation of new cable programing services resulted in a loss from its cable operations. The heavy investment to win cable franchises and to install systems is expected to total more then $1 billion by 1985, but despite anticipated short-term losses and rumors of a possible dissolution of the venture, the company's annual report stated, "Potential application of cable television resources to our other operations and expected future profitability continue to make our participation attractive."

Nevertheless, the supposed dissatisfaction over Warner Amex's heavy cable losses was held partly responsible for top-level executive changes at the parent American Express and in the joint venture.

Qube, Warner Amex's two-way cable tv, which offers 30 channels of news, movies, educational, civic and other programing by punching buttons on a console, continued to provide incentive for increased user participation and growth of the cable system. The year saw the introduction of a new Qube III home console, the BT-1300, which is only half the size of its predecessor and said to be the most advanced unit in use in interactive cable tv today.

Warner Amex Satellite Entertainment Co. (WASEC) currently distributes The Movie Channel, the first 24-hour premium service programing unedited feature films exclusively; MTV: Music Television, a 24-hour commercially-supported network offering contemporary music, and Nickelodeon, the only commercial-free network for children and young adults.

In a move designed to challenge the dominance of Time Inc.'s Home Box Office cable unit (HBO), WASEC acted to merge its Movie Channel, the third-largest pay cable network, with Showtime, the second-largest. The move would unite WASEC with three large movie studios and two other companies, a joint venture that would have about 6.3 million viewers, compared with HBO's 11 million, and about 31.5% of the total market of 20 million pay subscribers, compared with about 57% for HBO.

During 1982, the revenues of American Express Publishing Corp.'s two magazines continued to grow, with Food & Wine producing the biggest increase. Ad revenues for that magazine, according to Publishers Information Bureau, were $2.6 million, up 62% over 1981. Ad pages for 1982 totaled 413, a 24% increase over the previous year. About 80% of the magazine's subscribers are American Express card members.

Travel & Leisure recorded 1,116 ad pages for 1982, down about 4% from year-earlier figures. However, ad dollars for the year hit a record $20.7 million, a 9.7% increase over 1981. The magazine has an advertising rate base of 925,000, of which about 92% are American Express card members.

Since acquiring the magazine in September, 1980, the advertising rate base of Food & Wine has increased a total of 150%. The rate base jumped from 300,000 to 400,000 for a 33% boost last October, and to 500,000, 25% increase, this spring.

Food & Wine continues to offer regional breakouts. The eastern edition has a circulation rate base of 135.000, and the western edition is 100,000. For the first six months of fiscal '83, the magazine posted an increase of 62 pages over the same period last year, an increase of 42%. Life Styles Impact Plan, or LIP, allows advertisers to purchase space in both magazines, either in national editions or regionals.

Together, the two magazines are estimated to have contributed more than $23 million to Amex's total media revenues in 1982.

Army Times Publishing Co.

Army Times Publishing Co., Washington, is the country's 96th largest media company, with 1982 media property revenues are estimated by Advertising Age at $73.7 million, or 70% of total estimated revenues of $104.2 million.

In 1981, the privately held company had media revenues of $63.3 million, or 67% of total revenues of $94.4 million.

Nonmedia properties comprise commercial printing and periodical subscription sales via telephone. Army Times reports that the first quarter of 1983 is already shaping up better than the year before.

Journal Newspapers, a five-paper chain in its second year of converting from all weeklies to five-day-a-week publications, continues to operate in the red. "The short-term objective of our company is to get the Journals on the route to profitability," Henry L. Belber, executive vp, said. Audit Bureau of Circulations for the six-month period ending March 31 places the Journals' total circulation at 136,000, while the over-all profitability picture is improving for all five papers, Mr. Belber said.

The circulation of the military Army Times, Navy Times and Air Force Times, continues steady at 330,000. Federal Times, another paper in the group, attained a circulation of 40,000.

In addition to publishing and printing its own newspapers, as well as its own Times Magazine supplement and Military Market, a trade publication, Army Times' printing division rolls out the Washington/Baltimore editions of Gannett Co.'s national daily, USA Today. The press run is estimated at 50,000 copies.

Rupert Murdoch's national tabloid, The Star, rolls off Army Times' presses, and as of January, 1983, 700,000 weekly copies of Times Mirror Co.'s

Sporting News are being printed. Army Times also prints weekly newspaper supplements for clients including the Washington Post's tv magazine and a supplement for Safeway supermarkets.

To accommodate the 7 million-plus copies the company expects to print weekly in 1983, Army Times is enlarging its production plant in Springfield, Va. This is part of an over-all project that will consolidate Army Times' newspaper operations. Administrative headquarters, currently located in Washington, D.C., will be housed in a new three-story office building going up next to the printing plant. The management of Army Times' Telephone Marketing Co. also will move to the new address. Only the Montgomery Journal and Prince Georges Journal will remain at their present facilities in Rockville and Lenham, Md., respectively.

The enlarged printing facility will become operative this October, while the office building will open in mid-December. The consolidation effort meets the company's administrative objectives. "It's easier to manage an entire company if everything is together," Mr. Belber explains.

A new administrative position, vp-administration, was created this past year. Caroline Lee, former vp-administration for Channel 13, WNET-TV, the public television station in New York, now holds the same title at Army Times.

Army Times is currently testing some teletext activity in Virginia on a small scale; this may lead to a limited role for the company in cable.

A.H. Belo Corp.

A.H. Belo Corp., Dallas, publisher of the Dallas Morning News, is the nation's 47th largest media company, with media property revenues of $203.2 million.

Of that, $134.6 million, or 66%, came from newspaper publishing, and $68.6 million, or 34%, came from radio and tv broadcasting. Revenues were up 12.3% from $182.2 million in 1981.

Belo's earnings from newspaper publishing in 1982 were $16.1 million, down from $16.4 million in 1981, and earnings from tv and radio broadcasting were $27.1 million, up from $22.7 million the year before.

Total advertising revenues of the Dallas Morning News were $116.9 million in 1982, an increase of 14.2% over 1981. Revenue increases were the result of higher ad rates as well as additional ad linage. The Dallas Morning News increased its share of the full-run advertising market in 1982 to 53.6%, up from 53.0% in 1981, and extended its lead in the first quarter of 1983 to 55.5%.

Circulation revenues at the Dallas Morning News rose to $11.4 million in 1982, up 4.7% from $10.9 million in 1981. According to Audit Bureau of Circulations reports through March 31, 1983, the News gained more than 25,000 in Sunday circulation. Total Sunday circulation for the News was reported at 406,893, compared to 360,639 for the competing Times Herald (Times Mirror Corp). The News also widened its daily lead in total circulation over the Times Herald, reporting 328,332 compared with 272,870 for the Times Herald. The Times Herald, however, led the News in circulation for Dallas County by 4,936 daily and by 22,549 Sunday.

The Dallas Morning News ranked second in the U.S. in classified advertising in 1982, third in total advertising and third in retail advertising.

Total revenues for WFAA-TV, Dallas, Belo's chief broadcast media property, were $49.1 million, up 15% over 1981, representing more than 70% of total revenues from all Belo Broadcast properties.

In late 1982, Belo acquired Selective Media Services, a small direct marketing and distribution company that distributes national weekly news magazines and advertising circulars door to door in select upscale areas of Dallas.

Belo announced plans to construct a satellite Dallas Morning News production facility in suburban Plano that would increase press capacity by about 50%. It is to be completed by 1985 at a cost of $57 million.

Also, the News formed the Independent Press Service with Newhouse News Service, the London Telegraph, the Baltimore Sun, the Boston Globe and the Chicago Sun-Times to supply news coverage to more than 140 newspapers in the U.S. and more than 100 in Western Europe.

In May, Belo and General Electric Broadcasting signed a definitive agreement for Belo's purchase of radio stations KOA (am) and KOAQ (fm) in Denver for $22 million. Belo had also negotiated for the acquisition of WVUE-TV in New Orleans from Dallas-based Gaylord Broadcasting Co., a subsidiary of Oklahoma Publishing Co., but discussions were terminated in May when the two companies failed to reach a definite purchase agreement.

The News began including Parade magazine in its Sunday newspaper package beginning Jan. 3, 1982, and subsequently introduced improvements in its own Sunday magazine, renamed

TODAY, THEY'RE NOT SO SURE.

*Today, the Boston Herald has a circulation of over 300,000.

A lot of people are amazed—but we're not. After all, we've given people a lot of very good reasons to read the Herald—even if they had never read it before.

We improved our whole editorial package and attracted more upscale, educated, professional readers than ever before. We reintroduced the stock market tables, improved our sports coverage, added comics and new graphics.

We launched WINGO and other promotions, designed new trucks and paper racks and made the Herald more visible than it's ever been.

All of this has our competition keeping a close eye on what we're doing. Because while they knew we had nowhere to go but up, they're a little worried about how far up we're planning to go.

The addition of Parade at the News brought that weekly magazine back into the Dallas market after a year's absence. It had previously been distributed in the Times Herald.

Significant personnel changes at the company in 1982 included Joe M. Dealey's resignation as chief executive officer; he was succeeded by James M. Moroney Jr. Mr. Dealey continues as chairman, and Mr. Moroney continues as president and chief operating officer. John A. Rector Jr., formerly executive vp at the News, succeeded Mr. Moroney as president of the News. James P. Sheehan joined Belo as senior vp-chief financial officer. Jeremy Halbreich was named senior vp at the News, Harry Stanley was promoted to senior vp at the News from vp-advertising, and Burl Osborne was promoted to editor and senior vp from executive editor. Also, James Keeley was named vp-operations at the News, moving from Knight-Ridder Newspapers in Miami.

Bergen Evening Record Corp.

Bergen Evening Record Corp., Hackensack, N.J., is the nation's 89th largest media company, with 1982 media revenues totaling $86.1 million, or nearly all of the company's total revenues of $87.3 million.

The family-owned company's media revenues last year were $79.3 million out of total revenues of $80.4 million.

Circulation and advertising from the Record, the largest evening newspaper in New Jersey, and from the Ocean County Reporter, a semiweekly, totaled $66 million, a jump of almost $5 million from the previous year.

The Reporter, based in Toms River, N.J., was sold in January to Capital Cities Communications.

The company's broadcasting arm, Gateway Communications, which operates four tv stations, reached the $20 million revenue mark, up from $18 million in 1981.

Pretax earnings from media operations totaled $14 million, up about $700,000 from the year-earlier figures.

The company, owned by chairman Malcolm A. Borg and family trusts, projects revenues for 1983 of about $92 million.

In what company officials say was a "year of transition," 1982 was highlighted by the Record's unveiling of the cornerstone of its $62 million modernization project—conversion to high-speed, full-color offset presses. The paper thus became the first full-color daily in the New York metropolitan market.

With other new equipment, including a Ferag inserting/handling system, the Record has achieved what Mr. Borg termed "state-of-the-art" production.

An overnight switch from the old presses to the $23 million Japanese-manufactured machinery proved troublesome initially, prompting the Record's president and chief operating officer, Michael H. Heath, to say "We should have done more training."

The increase in color advertising in an area where shopping malls dot the map has been dramatic. In five months in 1982, with reduced prices for color offered to advertisers, the Record published more than 2.4 million lines of spot color and full-color ads. Figures for the first three months of 1983 show the Record has printed an additional 429 ads and more than 400,000 lines of color material.

Editorial color also has been added with revenues reaped from the ad sales.

"The paper looks prettier and more vital with full color," said Frank J. Savino, vp-marketing. "It appears to be having an impact on circulation and it's definitely bringing in results."

When the New York Daily News was threatened with closing last year, the Record admitted it would be ready to start a morning tabloid in the event of the News' demise.

The Hackensack-based Record did launch an "early edition," touted as a marketing experiment, that is averaging single copy sales of between 1,200 and 1,500.

Current circulation for 1982, listed by Audit Bureau of Circulations at 149,853, up a fraction over a year ago. The Sunday Record has a circulation of 221,409, up 3.1% from the previous year.

Courtesy of the new printing capabilities, the Sunday product was increased to 10 broadsheet sections while new sections also were added to the daily editions.

Company officials credit the combination of early edition, added color and new sections to a rise in circulation thus far in 1983.

The company continues to study the possibility of venturing into the cable tv arena and of producing commercials and films for profit. Space for studio facilities has been allocated at the Record's plant.

The corporation also is awaiting word of results of its involvement in the CBS/AT&T videotex venture, for which the Record provided news. In an address at a Rutgers University workshop last fall, Mr. Heath reportedly said the test generated little interest because "people have better things to do at night than retrieving information they can find in the newspaper."

Gateway Communications, the Bergen broadcasting arm, wants to grow. "We're looking for a property that fits with the four [stations] we have," said George A. Koehler, Gateway president.

Gateway now is completing plans for a new $4-million facility for WOWK-TV, its Huntington, W. Va., station.

Blade Co.

Blade Co., Toledo, O., is the nation's 62nd largest media company, with 1982 revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE at $141.4 million, all from media operations.

The privately owned newspaper, broadcast and cable company had estimated revenues of $122.6 million in 1981.

The daily Toledo Blade newspaper suffered circulation declines during the week but picked up Sunday circulation. The paper has been hurt by the steep recession in heavy industries like autos and steel.

"We are looking at 1983 with some modest enthusiasm," says John Harms, new president of the Blade Co., a former Detroit News executive, who joined the company in January.

In September, 1982, the company sold the Redbank Register, Shrewsbury, N.J., to Capital Cities Communications "because it no longer fit into our long-term corporate objectives," says William Block Jr., assistant to the president and son of co-owner William Block. Paul Block Jr., Mr. Block Sr.'s brother, is the other owner.

The company is "not aggressively seeking any new properties at this time," Mr. Harms says, adding "we are involved in maximizing the opportunities we have."

One of those opportunities is cable tv operations. "We're going through tremendous growth," said John Karl, president of the subsidiary Buckeye Cablevision in the Toledo area. "We've grown to 81,000 subscribers (up from 72,000 last year) with 33,000 taking pay services." The 60-channel system passes 150,000 homes and Mr. Karl credits "aggressive" marketing via multimedia as well as door-to-door solicitation with the high connect rate.

The Erie County cable is expanding to a 54 addressable channel system from 20. Subscriber growth lags behind Buckeye, but it's up to 14,500 subscribers out of 22,000 homes passed. The Monroe, Mich., cable operation is up to 5,000 homes out of 8,500 passed, with revenues jumping as additional pay services are phased in with a 54 channel capacity. The Blade is also experimenting with two-way cable primarily for home banking and security systems, Mr. Karl said. "We're not terribly excited about the home shopping idea," he said.

Buckeye is running a two-channel operation for Toledo Blade news—financial and sports interspersed with ads. All the cable systems are in the black.

The newspaper itself changed to a different system of press plate-making but still is operated on the letterpress method. There are no plans to move from afternoon delivery for the daily.

The Monterey Peninsula Herald, in California, fared better economically than the Blade but the effects of the recession are being felt there as well, Mr. Harms said. "It's been working hard to maintain its own, so to speak," he said.

CBS Inc.

CBS Inc., New York, is the second largest media company in the U.S., with revenues of $2.45 billion from media operations in 1982, up from $2.18 billion in 1981. Tv and radio broadcasting accounted for $2.16 billion in revenues, and publishing $290 million.

Total operating revenues for 1982 were $4.12 billion, a 4.2% increase over the previous year's $3.95 billion. Net income was $112.5 million, compared with $162.8 million in 1981.

Operating income dropped from $202.2 million in 1981 to $150.0 million.

Revenues for the CBS broadcast group increased at about 13%, and CBS publishing group revenues increased modestly. However, the CBS records group revenues dropped for the third consecutive year. CBS Columbia group revenues increased last year following the acquisition in August, 1982 of the Ideal Toy Corp.

Net income in 1982 was adversely affected by CBS Cable, an advertiser-supported cable programing service, and the specialty stores division, which operated retail outlets selling home entertainment products. CBS Cable was discontinued and the specialty stores were sold.

In 1983, CBS entered a new era as chairman William S. Paley, who founded the company, retired in April. Thomas Wyman replaced Mr. Paley as chairman, although Mr. Paley retained his office at CBS, and many observers believe his influence on management will still be felt in the future.

Further, the broadcast group has been lobbying heavily for repeal of the Federal Communications Commission's financial interest and domestic syndication rule that currently prohibits any of the three tv networks from syndicating programs they do not produce themselves. If the rule is repealed, CBS-TV, as well as its two rival networks, could become involved in the lucrative $800 million domestic syndication business. Opponents of the repeal, however, argue that the networks, if allowed back into domestic syndication, could "warehouse" the most desirable tv syndication properties and deny competing independent stations fair access to those programs. All three networks have denied both the intent and the possibility of warehousing programing.

CBS-TV network enters the fall 1983-1984 broadcast season having won its fourth straight audience ratings battle, narrowly defeating ABC-TV.

The hit series "M*A*S*H" had its final original episode aired in March. The 2½-hour concluding episode was an advertising sell-out, with 30-second commercials costing between $350,000 and $400,000.

Even without "M*A*S*H" in its lineup, CBS returns next fall with the most power house series of any of the three networks, including "Magnum, P.I.," "Dallas" and "60 Minutes." Of the three networks, CBS made the fewest changes for the fall to its existing program schedule.

The shuttering of CBS Cable, the $30 million failure that featured primarily arts programing, attracted the most media attention for the company in 1982, with predictions that cable tv may no longer be all its proponents had predicted.

Perhaps the single most controversial step CBS took last year was its elimination of guarantees to advertisers for delivering particular demographic audiences in prime time. As a result, CBS sold the least time of any network in the upfront market.

The CBS strategy was to sell less upfront, and have more inventory left to sell in the scatter market when prices were generally higher.

The strategy appeared to backfire when the scatter market in the first two quarters in 1983 failed to materialize as expected. The softness of the scatter market was covered up in large part during the third quarter of 1982 when the Players' Association of the National Football League staged a 57-day walk-out and diverted football ad dollars into the scatter market. When football was resumed and the season completed, the scatter market remained weak.

CBS last December promoted its network sales chief of five years, Paul Isacsson, to head up its cable and new technologies new ventures group, Cable/CBG Broadcast, and named Jerry Dominus as vp-sales. At the same time, Tony C. Malara was promoted from general manager of the network to president.

Mr. Wyman described the CBS corporate strategy to the

WBBM's big shoulders strengthen CBS

By Eileen Norris

Somehow, what with the front door in perpetual swing at CBS's crowning jewel, WBBM-TV in Chicago, you can't help but think the station's call letters really stand for Winners Born, Bred and Matured here.

Since 1979, WBBM-TV has been No. 1 in Chicago, and the station shows no signs of making way for its competition. But it is also the major showplace for the starry-eyed who beckon the big time. In the last 10 years, WBBM-TV has been the sojourn point—the step-away-from—for more than a dozen of the network's top people, leading some to say CBS's management flow chart must be penned in erasable ink.

There are the well known success stories like Van Gordon Sauter, now president of CBS News and once news director at WBBM. And Ed Joyce, his No. 2 man, who once was vp-general manager at the Chicago CBS affiliate.

But there are others like Bob Ferrante, now executive producer of the "CBS Morning News" and Jay Feldman, vp-general manager of WCAU-TV, the CBS-owned affiliate in Philadelphia. Both men were news directors at WBBM-TV before making their ascension.

And there's Peter Temple, once director of financial planning for WBBM and now vp-finance for CTS, CBS owned tv stations division. And there is Jim Joyella, who moved up to become vp-marketing services at CBS from director of local sales at WBBM.

Indeed, of the five CBS owned stations in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia and St. Louis, all but one of those general manager's has flexed his creative muscle at WBBM-TV along the way.

Even Neil Derrough, president-CTS, was himself vp-general manager of Channel 2 in Chicago from 1974 to 1977, a time when the station wasn't the best. So what does he say about this powerful "ace" station that churns out the talent at CBS?

Ober: Chicago is a good serious news town.

Mr. Derrough thankfully doesn't discount that Chicago is a highly lucrative city to practice journalism. "It's a legendary news town, but WBBM has gained recognition because it has a lot of good, solid people. Everybody wins there, those who go on and those who stay," he says, making a point of the on-air types who have stayed, including salty political commentator Walter Jacobson and movie critic Gene Siskel. Both have seen many general managers come and go.

"WBBM, by all measures, is the best station in the country," Mr. Derrough adds. "You don't just catch that station losing its poise. They pay attention to what is going on around them."

"The opportunity to run a station this good is awesome," says Eric Ober, WBBM's vp-general manager since January. Mr. Ober is back at WBBM, having been news director there from 1971 until 1981, when he was shifted to fill two other CBS jobs in New York.

"Chicago is a good serious news town and our competition [WLS-TV, the ABC affiliate, and WMAQ-TV, the NBC local] covers the news pretty well," he says noting that all three tv stations compete with the Chicago Tribune and Sun-Times on breaking news stories.

But when it comes to Nielsen ratings, WBBM-TV's newscasts have it all over the other two stations. (For the 10 p.m. news slot in March, for example, WBBM had a 30 share, compared with WLS's 22 and WMAQ's 19.)

WBBM's news and documentary award listings take up six typewritten pages—and that's just for 1982 and 1983.

The winning streak doesn't appear to be slowing either. Sure, WBBM-TV may have lost anchor Bill Kurtis to the "CBS Morning News." On the other hand, it gained one of the most well known investigative reporters in Chicago for its news staff: Pamela Zekman. She quit the Sun-Times to head an investigative unit at WBBM and recently walked away with a prestigious Peabody Award for a series called "Killing Crime." The report detailed how the Chicago Police Department wiped off as "unfounded" more than 40% of the robberies, burglaries and rapes from the police blotter, apparently to bolster the city's image.

Even the two daily newspapers swallowed their pride to editorialize about Channel 2's findings, which have since been substantiated by an FBI analysis.

The consistent pattern of management traffic hasn't seemed to alter what the station produces, partially, says Mr. Ober, because most people don't sit around and look to the network for a promotion.

"On-air people might see us as the best local news station they can work at or maybe as a stepping stone to the network, but I wouldn't want a hired gun to work here or someone that planned to 'use' us," says Mr. Ober. "Most come here to stay."

Every general manager has brought something different—and much needed—to WBBM, says Mr. Derrough, who is Mr. Ober's boss. "I'd like nothing better than for our other stations to aspire to what WBBM has achieved," he adds.

Derrough: No magic formula for picking people.

The people who are pegged to move into management or to the network are usually generalists who display a broad range of talent, says Mr. Derrough. "There is no magic formula that CBS has for picking and moving people into executive or managerial positions," he adds.

For WBBM-TV's newest general manager, whose strongest background is news, it will be "knowing when to shut up and when to give an opinion," says Mr. Ober.

"I came here as a student in the areas like programing, sales and promotion, but at a staff meeting the other morning I talked about sales for 10 minutes and I actually sounded like I knew what I was talking about. And I did," he jokes.

His job, says CTS boss Mr. Derrough, is to take a long hard look at what the station is doing and make it even better.

"Unless I screw up, I expect to be here a number of years," says Mr. Ober, sounding very much like an executive who will be kicked upstairs—again. AA company's shareholders as two-pronged: To build on its base in broadcasting and to pursue potentially profitable enterprises in the emerging communications technologies.

Primarily through joint ventures, CBS has entered into ventures in the fields of videotex, teletext, multipoint distribution services, theatrical film production, videogame development and distribution, computer software marketing and video and computer extensions of its publishing concerns.

In 1982, two new businesses were started: CBS/Fox Video, a joint venture with 20th Century Fox, and Tri-Star Studios, a triparty venture with CBS, Columbia Pictures and Home Box Office to produce feature films for distribution to the pay cable service and theatrical movie houses.

The tv network, however, continues to be the cornerstone of CBS's broadcast operations. CBS-TV Network last year had seven of the top ten rated series on its network, including the highest rated show, "60 Minutes." The network performed particularly well with its miniseries "The Blue and the Gray" and "The Royal Romance of Charles and Diana," as well as with blockbuster theatrical films such as "Private Benjamin" and "Rocky II." CBS also made gains in daytime ratings, although it still placed second to ABC.

In sports, CBS added National Collegiate Athletic Assn. football in 1982, although the future of that contract is uncertain because of a U.S. Appellate Court decision to uphold a lower court ruling granting colleges the right to make individual contracts for the sale of broadcast and syndication rights to their football games. Pending further appeal by the NCAA, the court ruling could nullify the CBS, ABC and Turner Broadcasting System broadcast contracts with the NCAA.

This year, however, CBS Sports should benefit from a full professional football season. In addition, CBS next year will broadcast six major golf tournaments previously aired by NBC. CBS will also continue broadcasts of the Masters Golf tournament, the U.S. Open Tennis Championships, the Belmont Stakes, the Daytona 500, the National Basketball Assn. regular season and championship games and the Professional Golfers Assn. tour.

CBS News continued to rank first in audience ratings, even after Walter Cronkite ceded the anchor position to Dan Rather. At the same time, however, the CBS News staff was cut back in an economy move.

In February, 1982, CBS expanded its "Morning News" to two hours and named Bill Kurtis and Diane Sawyer as co-anchors, replacing Charles Kuralt. Last October, CBS launched "CBS Early Morning News" to run preceding the "Morning News." At the same time, CBS introduced "Nightwatch," an all-night news broadcast.

Earlier this month in a highly publicized case in California, CBS-TV, "60 Minutes" and anchorman Dan Rather were cleared of slander charges brought by a doctor who sued for $30 million after a segment of the program had linked him to insurance fraud.

The CBS tv stations division had a record year for revenues and profits for the CBS-owned stations in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia and St. Louis. The stations also expanded local news coverage and lengthened their local newscasts in early evenings.

The CBS radio division last year launched a new radio network, RADIORADIO, and by February, 1983, the new young adult programing service had signed 113 affiliated stations. CBS-owned fm radio stations had record sales and profits, primarily because of the changes in programing formats at five of the seven stations that led to a 27% increase in listeners. CBS am radio stations had record revenues in 1982, relying predominantly on all news and news/talk/sports formats.

CBS publishing group had a modest gain in revenues while profits declined from $43.1 million in 1981 to $38.0 million last year. The educational and professional publishing divisions enjoyed record sales and profits despite a difficult marketplace, while the consumer publishing division showed a decline in profits.

In 1982, CBS consumer publishing acquired Cuisine, a monthly magazine with a circulation of about 750,000. Woman's Day, the company's flagship consumer publication, increased its ad revenues in 1982. Field & Stream also increased in circulation and advertising revenues, but Mechanix Illustrated saw ad revenues decline.

Audio magazine also showed revenue declines, while Cycle World ad sales were flat, and revenue gains were posted for World Tennis, Road & Track and American Photographer.

The consumer publishing division last year established a sales network for its magazines, offering advertisers combination packages with all of the company's titles. The company also explored video extensions of its publications, including production of a cable tv show, "Woman's Day USA," which plays on the USA Cable Network.

Cuisine feeds on epicurean elite

By Abbe Wichman

By her own admission, Anne Sutherland Fuchs, publisher of Cuisine, epitomizes her magazine's audience.

She works days that run from breakfast to dinner meetings, travels extensively, is renovating an apartment and is enjoying a 1½-year-old marriage. While all of the above aren't Cuisine readership criteria, the magazine's adherents have, says Mrs. Fuchs, "the power to say what they want and the money to acquire it."

How fast we forget; it was a little more than a year ago that Cuisine itself had neither power or money. Acquired by CBS Inc. in April, 1982, the magazine has undergone a stunning rejuvenation. In February of this year the company underscored its commitment by bringing the rate base back up to 750,000 after it had been lowered to 725,000. CBS raised the subscription and cover prices, and began using a higher quality paper stock. And in June the magazine will have its biggest issue in history.

Anne Sutherland Fuchs: The bandages are off.

The February turnabout was accomplished six months after Mrs. Fuchs came on board. She started her publishing career in the advertising department at the New York Times and went on to three varied positions at the Charter Publishing Co. Although Mrs. Fuchs didn't necessarily see herself moving into the "epicurean" field, she says that if one had to create a life style magazine of today, it would deal with food. "People are constantly asking each other, 'Where did you go, what did you eat?' . . . There is a great thirst for knowledge of food and wine." This month, CBS named Hugh Johnson, author of "The World Atlas of Wine," which has sold 1.5 million copies, as the magazine's new wine editor.

Comparing her readers to theater buffs, Mrs. Fuchs says, "We want a market where people make the time, and insist on living well every day." She believes people are growing more interested in sharing their home environment, as "an extension of their lives."

To catch up with this "affluent market with those very attractive flexible dollars," Mrs. Fuchs has some definite ideas. "We set out to evolve the magazine, not to revolutionize it," she explains. Cuisine's subtitle, "The Magazine Of Fine Food And Gracious Living," should speak for itself, she says.

"Our goal was to establish the product first, then get the audience, and then go to the advertisers," Mrs. Fuchs says. "We knew advertisers were going to be hesitant after the magazine's problems, so we wanted to be able to reassure them that the bandages were off."

Mrs. Fuchs contends that advertisers should find Cuisine to be attractive because the publication functions as a reference guide. "When we print a recipe or visit a destination, we want to be printing the definitive piece," she says. And speaking even more confidently Mrs. Fuchs adds, "There's only one standard, and we're aiming to set it."

Looking at the magazine field as a whole, and discussing the problems of Cuisine's original management, Mrs. Fuchs notes, "It's not uncommon what happened at the magazine, the chance for entrepreneurial investments in this field is limited." But right now, operating from an "environment of strength," Mrs. Fuchs says, "We're in magazine utopia."

Cahners Publishing Co.

Cahners Publishing Co., Boston, is the country's 67th largest media company, with revenues of $130.0 million from media operations for fiscal 1982, which ended March 31, 1982. That is an increase of 30% from fiscal 1981 media revenues of $100.0 million.

Media revenues represented 75% of the company's total revenues of an estimated $160.0 million in 1982, up from the previous year's total revenues of $150.0 million.

Although fiscal 1983 ended this March, for consistency the figures used to rank Cahners in this issue are for fiscal 1982. The company, however, continued to expand in fiscal 1983, albeit at a slower pace, with media property revenues rising 8% to an estimated $140 million, while total revenues increased to $186.7 million.

Cahners is a sister publishing and exposition/trade show company of the International Publishing Corp. of Great Britain, both of which are divisions of a United Kingdom corporation, Reed Holdings. Media revenues come primarily from advertising placed in the company's 30 trade magazines, most of which have controlled circulation within the individual industries they reach.

All of the company's magazines are grouped in a magazine publishing division headed by J. Allan Sheehan. Eighteen are published out of Chicago, three out of New York and the remainder out of Boston. Early in 1982, the magazine division was organized into four groups: Manufacturing industries; building and construction; electronics and computers, and foodservice, each of which is headed by a group vp.

In a major move in March, Cahners added a fifth group to its magazine division with the acquisition of the assets of Fischer Medical Publications, New York. Fischer is known as one of the leading publishers of medical journals, including Emergency Medicine, Journal of Cardiovascular Medicine and Transition/Medicine and the Aging Process. Each has controlled circulation, with reader qualification dependent upon the age of the doctor and length of practice. Prospective readers' names are taken from the American Medical Assn. list of member physicians.

The acquisition marks Cahners' first entry into the healthcare market. "The healthcare and medical fields are growth fields," said Mr. Sheehan. "We liked the market because pharmaceutical companies are committed to specialized medical magazines. I can't think of another group as committed."

For now, Fischer remains autonomous, and its magazines will continue to be published in New York. Steven Fischer, founder and chief executive officer of the company, will remain as president.

In another major move, in September, 1982, Cahners launched Business Computer Systems, a publication devoted to the selection, use and expansion of computers and computer systems used in business. The publication was begun to target a specific market, that of readers who are end users of business computers. In order to qualify to receive the magazine, those who apply must identify the computers they use and their applications; they must participate in buying decisions and must identify their job function and the primary business activity for which their computer system is used.

In staffing BCS, Cahners chose as publisher S. Henry Sacks. He is also publisher of Mini-Micro Systems, Cahners' fastest-growing publication.

Of the first year of the reorganization of the magazine division. Mr. Sheehan says, "It was most timely. As times got tough, the ability of the group vps to work quickly allowed us to rigorously control costs. We had a good year, due in part to the reorganization because we were able to be more reactive and to serve our markets better."

In upper management promotions during the year, Terrence M. McDermott was appointed group publisher of Electric Packaging & Production, Electro-Optics and Semiconductor International, three electronics magazines published at the Chicago headquarters. Mr. McDermott remains as publisher of Building Design & Construction. Joseph E. Modaff was named publisher of Building Supply News. He succeeds Harold J. Sugarman, who, as part of the reorganization, was named group vp of the building construction group. Also during this year, Peter T. Orsi was named publisher of Professional Builder. His predecessor, Marsh Trimble, was named publishing director of the magazine.

Last August, the Chicago division, from which nearly half of Cahners' publications are produced, moved its offices out of the city to Des Plaines, a suburb about 15 miles northwest of the city, near O'Hare International Airport.

Reflecting on the year, Mr. Sheehan said the foodservice and electronics books were up in ad pages, and while the building books were down in ad pages, Cahners "didn't go off as badly as many of our competitors. We maintained our share of market for the seventh consecutive year."

Mr. Sheehan expects revenue from the magazine division to reach $160 million by the end of fiscal year 1984. He also does not rule out other acquisitions and launches in the future—and not only in the high-tech and healthcare fields. Planned for September, 1984, is the launch of CPI/Purchasing, a magazine in the manufacturing industry. The publication would go to the people who make the buying decisions in the chemical processing industries.

Representing the other 25% of Cahners' total revenue is the tradeshow and exposition group, which runs more than 75 shows worldwide in several different industries, including some of those served by the company's magazines and at which these magazines are distributed.

Capital Cities Communications

Capital Cities Communications, New York, is the country's 15th largest media company, with 1982 revenues of $663.6 million, all from media operations, a 16% increase from 1981 revenues of $573.8 million. Net income climbed 20% to $96.31 million from $80.5 million in 1981.

Revenue from the company's publishing operations once again far outpaced revenue from its broadcasting and cable tv operations.

Publishing revenues in 1982 totaled $389.3 million, while broadcasting and cable tv totaled $274.3 million.

On all three of its fronts, publishing, broadcast and cable, Capital Cities major advancements have been instituted through acquisition and new programing formats.

During 1982 and early 1983, the company acquired several publications. Last September, it purchased the Red Bank (N.J.) Register, with a circulation of 33,000 daily and 34,000 Sunday.

Also, last September, two weekly newspapers were added to its Shore Line Newspapers group, the Mystic Compass and the Old Lyme Gazette, both in Connecticut.

In January, the company acquired the Ocean County (N.J.) Reporter, which is published twice weekly and has a circulation of 80,000.

Additionally, Capital Cities this year purchased the remaining interest in American Traveler, in which it has held an interest since 1979.

American Traveler publishes the Travel Agent, a twice-weekly magazine for travel agents with a circulation of 32,000; the Interline Reporter, a monthly for airline personnel with 19,000 circulation, and El Travel Agent Internacional, a Spanish and Portuguese language monthly for the Latin American travel agent.

The company's specialized publications group turned in a record performance in 1982. Record revenues and earnings at

W, Women's Wear Daily and the international medical news group offset lower revenues and profits from the industrial publications—American Metal Market, Metal/Center News, Heat Treating and Electronic News.

The company's professional press group, which was acquired by Capital Cities in 1980, again operated at a small loss.

The professional press group this spring introduced SportStyle, with an initial circulation of 150,000, sold through subscriptions, newsstand and specialty retail outlets.

New publication startups and acquisitions since Fairchild Publications became a part of Capital Cities in 1968 continued to produce substantial returns. In 1982, startups and acquisitions contributed 42% of the revenues and 36% of the operating income of the specialized publications group.

Also, through Capital Cities publishing division, the Cable Connection, a joint venture of the company's Fort Worth newspaper, the Star-Telegram, and the Fort Worth cable tv franchisee, received strong acceptance during its first full year of operation.

In 1982, Star-Text, a joint venture of the Star-Telegram and Tandy Corp., was introduced to Tarrant County. Originally designed for certain Tandy terminals, the videotex service was modified in October so it can be received by any home computer with the necessary equipment. At year end, Star-Text had approximately 300 subscribers and a 90% renewal rate.

Capital Cities' broadcasting division—tv and radio stations—again achieved record levels of revenues amounting to $221 million.

National spot tv advertising, accounting for more than 60% of the gross tv revenues, showed a 17% gain over-all, with the company's Houston, New Haven and Durham stations reporting the greatest increases.

The company's six tv stations were again market leaders. In the February ratings period, five stations were top rated in their markets, while the sixth was ranked No. 2.

Its commitment to the development and expansion of local news and public affairs programs continued during the year. The six stations combined carried almost 90 hours of local live news each week. News programs were also added Monday through Friday at several of the company's tv stations.

In September, WJR (fm), Detroit, became WHYT (fm), with a new format, playing top 40 hits. The change was initiated in the hopes of presenting the company with a marketing opportunity by attracting a younger audience (ages 12 to 34).

Of the company's 14 radio stations—seven am and seven fm—WPAT (am, fm) in New York, WJR (am) in Detroit and KSCS (fm) in Dallas/Fort Worth, are ranked No. 1.

The cable tv division became profitable in 1982. Capital Cities first became a major factor in the business with the 1981 acquisition of Cablecom-General for $139 million.

As part of that purchase, Capital Cities gained a 26% partnership interest in Community Cablevision of Odessa, Tex., a system serving 23,000 basic subscribers.

Following discussions with government authorities in Odessa, a new 20-year franchise was awarded to Community Cablevision with the understanding that the system be substantially rebuilt to deliver 52 channels instead of the 13 currently available.

Following this agreement each of the equity partners had to decide whether to continue with their investment or sell their interests to Capital Cities. Following the decision of all of the partners to sell, last October the company gained full ownership at an additional purchase price of $13.5 million. Minority interests in two other systems acquired with Cablecom were also purchased in 1982. Cable tv acquisitions for the year totaled $16.5 million.

Earlier this year, the company acquired two additional small systems in Vinita and Nowata, Okla.

Central Newspapers

Central Newspapers, Indianapolis, is the nation's 27th largest media company with 1982 revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE of $315.0 million compared with an estimated $304.5 million in 1981, all from media properties.

The conservative Central Newspapers continues to put virtually all of its efforts into newspapers, with some limited experimentation in the cable area. Its seven newspapers dominate the Arizona and Indiana markets they serve.

The largest of the papers is the morning Arizona Republic. That property and its sister paper, the evening Phoenix Gazette, are enjoying a steady circulation growth of about 5% a year, says Central president Frank Russell.

A recently completed satellite plant in Mesa, Ariz., is helping the company achieve its goals of increased growth in Phoenix and outstate Arizona by boosting capabilities for outstate distribution.

Combined morning and evening circulation of the Arizona papers for the Audit Bureau of Circulations for the six months ended March 31, was 421,076, compared with 406,100 for the same period in 1982. For Sunday, the Republic posted 1983 circulation of 448,771, up from 432,397 in 1982.

Indianapolis is the second largest market for Central. The combined circulation of the company's morning Indianapolis Star and evening Indianapolis News rose to 360,476 from 356,990 in 1982. Sunday circulation of the Star also gained, climbing to 373,897 for 1983, from 361,571 for the comparable 1982 period.

Central's Muncie Star and Press posted a combined daily circulation of 46,551 for 1983, rising slightly from 1982's 46,141. The morning Star had a 1983 Sunday circulation of 34,661, compared with 33,586 in 1982.

In Vincennes, Ind., the Vincennes Sun-Commercial (evening and Sunday) had a daily circulation (Monday through Friday) of 14,770 and Sunday circulation of 15,880. Both figures are down slightly from 1982 totals of 14,929 daily and 15,970 Sunday.

The company continues to look for other newspapers to acquire. "We're always agreeable to entering into expansion in the field," says Mr. Russell, adding that he has no interest in broadcast properties.

A cable venture in Phoenix, R/G Cable, continues to be the only nonnewspaper venture for Central. R/G (which stands for Republic/Gazette) leases three channels from a Storer Broadcasting cable system. It runs 24-hour text news on one, text classified ads on a second channel, and will have audio-video housing ads on the third.

This new real estate ad channel will be running by late summer, says Joe Cole, manager of R/G. The channels now reach about 45,000 subscribers through the Storer system, up from 20,000 the year before.

Commenting on the real estate channel's potential, Mr. Cole noted, "The housing industry is picking up around Phoenix." The recession affected even that ultimate Sunbelt city, but with housing on the rise again, the timing of the new channel should put it in an advantageous position.

R/G is also involved with Times Mirror Co. in videotext experiments, but that venture is "still in the research and development stage," says Mr. Cole.

Chronicle Publishing Co.

Chronicle Publishing Co., San Francisco, ranks 29th among the nation's largest media companies, with 1982 revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE at $296.3 million, all from media operations. Chronicle media revenues for 1981 were reestimated at $234.7 million.

The company is wholly owned by the family trust of the M.H. de Young estate. Michael de Young began publication of the San Francisco Chronicle, the city's dominant morning newspaper, in 1865.

While the company now owns four television stations and a large cable tv system, the Chronicle continues to account for the majority of corporate revenues. Circulation has grown by about 5,000 in each of the last several years. Circulation in March, 1983, was 535,050, according to Audit Bureau of Circulations.

The San Francisco Sunday Examiner & Chronicle, which is jointly owned by the company and the Hearst Corp., had a March circulation of 695,898.

The company also owns the Bloomington (Ill.) Daily Pantagraph, which has a circulation of 52,428.

With the company's flagship growing steadily but unspectacularly, cable tv may provide most of the revenue gains in the next few years. Western Communications, Chronicle's cable arm, has 154,000 subscribers in California and New Mexico. The 15-year-old cable company won't grow much from new subscribers, because it already enjoys a saturation rate of 75% to 80%.

But the cable system is being rebuilt, from a current capacity of 12 channels in most areas to 35 channels. Only one pay service—Showtime in California and Home Box Office in New Mexico—is now available. Ed Allen, president of Western Communications, said three or four pay services will be available in most areas when rebuilding is complete. In addition, the company has begun a three-year, $5 million program to make its system fully addressable.

The expanded system will allow Western Communications to begin pay-per-view service by the end of 1983. "We'll start with events like boxing and rock concerts and ultimately we may go into the lesser movies," said Mr. Allen.

He said that the company hopes to attract cable advertisers when the system is rebuilt.

In the meantime, he said, "We're projecting a significant revenue increase for 1983, and we should have a better operating profit in three years. Once the [addressable] boxes are in place, the bankable dollars should increase significantly."

Mr. Allen said Western Communications has no plans to win any new franchises—"It's the silly season out there"—but growth could come from acquisition of existing systems. Proceeds from the sale of KRON-TV, San Francisco, to the Gannett Co. could be used to acquire cable systems.

Chronicle Broadcasting agreed in September to sell KRON to Gannett for about $100 million. Chronicle would also get KOCO-TV, the ABC affiliate in Oklahoma City, from Gannett.

But Chronicle and Gannett still haven't reached a definitive agreement. In the meantime, general manager Jim Smith said KRON will try to operate as if the station weren't being sold.

"But it's a difficult situation," he acknowledged. "Under the agreement we're committed to a certain amount of expenditures, and we have every intention of going forward. But we probably won't exceed that commitment."

That means that an aggressive attempt to improve the ratings of KRON's 11 p.m. news will probably await Gannett's takeover. KRON is running a distant third in the news battle.

One obstacle to the completion of the KRON deal was removed in May when Gannett sold the Oakland Tribune to editor and publisher Robert Maynard. Under Federal Communications Commission rules, the Tribune had to be sold before Gannett could take ownership of KRON.

If the KRON deal is completed, Chronicle Publishing will be left without a tv station in the top 40 markets. (The company also owns KUPK-TV, Garden City, Kan., KAKE-TV, Wichita, Kan., and WOWT, Omaha, Neb.) Mr. Smith said the company isn't actively pursuing new acquisitions, but that any acquisitions in the future would probably be in the "middle-range" markets.

One new venture for Chronicle in 1982 is Chronicle Videotex, a joint venture with Times Mirror. Phelps Dewey, the Chronicle's assistant publisher, said the company hopes to start the home information delivery system by the end of the year. He said the system will concentrate on information, not news.

Continental Cablevision

Continental Cablevision, Boston, is the country's 77th largest media company, with 1982 revenues of $108.7 million, all from cable tv interests. This is an increase of 49% over 1981's $73 million revenue figure. The company's net income in 1982 was $10.2 million, compared with $17 million in 1981.

In 1982, the company passed an additional 286,000 homes. The 13th largest multiple system operator in the U.S., Continental ended its first quarter in 1983 with 630,000 subscribers in 70 systems in 11 states. It continued to maintain an unusually high ratio of pay subscribers (697,591, up 59% from 1981) to basic subscribers (637,703, up 33% from 1981). Through March, 1983, the company had 1.3 million homes passed.

The privately held company at the end of 1982 had assets of $270 million, operating income of $41.5 million and earnings of $29 million.

During the past year, Continental added 22 new franchises, representing about 350,000 potential new homes. The most significant of these include one of five franchise areas in Chicago (representing 180,000 potential homes), 10 franchise areas in northern Connecticut (37,000 potential homes) and Staten Island, N.Y. (55,000 potential homes). The company in 1982 added 30,000 new cable homes by buying out several small systems in New Hampshire and Massachusetts and by acquiring St. Louis County (representing 27,000 homes) from American Television & Communications Co. for an unspecified amount.

Continental activated 15 systems in 1982. The major ones included Springfield, Mass. (60,000 potential homes), Brockton, Mass. (35,000 potential homes), Westchester and four other western suburbs of Chicago (38,000 potential homes), a three-county area of Richmond, Va. (18,000 potential homes) and Oakland County, Mich. (27,000 potential homes).

Continental's only major pending franchise application is in St. Paul, Minn. Although the company also has applications pending in suburbs of Chicago, Boston, Detroit and Cleveland, it has virtually ceased its pursuit of new franchises because much of its funds are tied up in current system construction.

The company, however, has begun to break ground in the field of cellular radio, having applied to the Federal Communications Commission for cellular radio licenses in 15 markets, including Lansing, Mich.; Richmond, Va., and Charlotte, N.C.

Continental acquired its first system in Tiffin, O., and Fostoria, O., in 1965. In November, 1981, Dow Jones & Co. purchased an initial 16% interest in the company. In January, 1982, Dow Jones bought an additional 9.5%, boosting its total holdings to about 25%.

Continental Cablevision was founded in 1963 by two Harvard Business School classmates, Amos Hostetter, CCI president and chief executive officer, and H. I. Grousveck, CCI chairman. The company is divided into seven regions, each under the management of its own vp-general manager responsible for franchising, renewals and making decisions about such things as equipment purchases independent from Boston corporate headquarters. Continental's corporate executives feel that decentralization has accounted for much of the company's success.

Copley Newspapers

Copley Newspapers, La Jolla, Cal., the 45th largest media company in the country, had 1982 media revenues of $209.3 million, or about 99% of total revenues of $210.0 million. In 1981, Copley reported media revenues of $205.6 million.

The family-owned business is still primarily involved in newspapers in California and Illinois, but has expanded its involvement in cable tv and electronic publishing.

After losing a bid two years ago for a cable franchise in Torrance, Cal., to Teleprompter (now Group W), Copley and its bidding partner, Colony Communications (owned by Providence Journal Co., Providence, R.I.), last year won franchises in two neighboring communities: San Pedro-Wilmington-Harbor City area of Los Angeles in April and the city of Lomita in December. The east-west team was the only bidder for a third franchise, in an unincorporated portion of Los Angeles County. Copley/Colony will most likely pursue other cable franchises in Orange County later this year.

Copley's involvement in electronic publishing led to the formation of a special unit last September called Copley Videotex Group. Peter Kaye, on leave from his job as associate editor of the San Diego Union, heads the division, which includes 16 people.

Copley is experimenting with three electronic publishing ventures. The first is Time Teletext, a full channel one-way distribution system delivered over Time Inc.'s cable system, Southwestern Cable, for which Copley provides a local news, weather and sports package. INDAX is an interactive system carried by Cox Communications over its San Diego cable system. Copley contributes a local and national news package for this venture.

Later this year, Copley will launch a third two-way system that will be accessible via telephone and viewable on a home computer or television screen. At presstime, the company said it was likely to join with HomServ, Greenwich, Conn., a company specializing in transactional services software (which permit banking and shopping at home) and a major computer manufacturer. Copley will provide a news package on this system in Del Mar, Cal.

In early May, Copley launched an electronic classified ad service called CLEO (Computer Listing of Employment Opportunities) in California. The service initially listed jobs in technical areas, such as engineering and computer programing, but may expand to include other fields later. The "help wanted" ads are purchased by businesses and accessed by personal and business computer users via telephone. If the venture is successful, Copley plans to extend it into other areas of the country.

Newspapers remain Copley's principal source of profit. The company's San Diego properties grew despite the recession, while its five Illinois dailies felt the impact of hard times more strongly, according to marketing director Stuart Neffeler. Overall circulation for all Copley newspapers in 1982 was 646,603, not including the recently purchased Evening Outlook.

The San Diego Union accounted for more of the growth than the San Diego Evening Tribune. The Union, aside from having greater drawing power as the city's morning paper, is edited to appeal to the growing outlying areas of San Diego. Total circulation for both is 348,209 daily and 348,856 Sunday for the Union, according to March, 1983, Audit Bureau of Circulations figures.

Copley's four Chicago-area dailies experienced a drop of about 2,500 from 129,438 for the six months period ending March, 1982 to 126,861, for the period ending March, 1983, a drop that Mr. Neffeler attributed as much to reduced promotions as to the soft economy in that area. "We're still making money, but we would look for a much better 1983," Mr. Neffeler said. Circulation of the Springfield (Ill.) State Journal-Register was 69,925 daily, the March, 1983 ABC figures, a slight drop from 70,333 a year earlier. Sunday circulation stayed almost even, rising from 71,367 to 71,489.

Hoping to solidify its position in the Los Angeles harbor area, Copley agreed to buy the Santa Monica Evening Outlook and seven free weeklies from United Western Newspapers, its corporate owner, in late March, of this year. Terms were not disclosed, but United Western's asking price for the Outlook reportedly was $17 million. United Western is owned by the Funk and McClure families.

Ironically, they originally acquired the newspaper in 1932 from Col. Ira C. Copley, founder of the Copley chain, who purchased the Outlook once before, in 1928.

The reasons given for the recent sale included estate tax problems and the distance of the two families from Santa Monica, as well as the advanced age of one of its principal owners, Mrs. J.D. Funk, the mother of Outlook publisher J. Deane Funk.

The six-day-a-week paper also suffered from declining circulation, slipping from 33,660 in the March, 1982, ABC audit to 26,504 a year later.

Company officials claim this circulation drop was due to the paper switching from a carrier collection system to a paid-by-mail in advance system, a plan the new owners now expect to drop. Purchase of the paper and the weeklies, which reach a combined circulation of over 160,000, will give Copley continuous daily circulation from Malibu down to Long Beach and a foothold in the decidedly upscale Los Angeles' western edge. Adding the Outlook to Copley's adjacent properties, the Daily Breeze (Torrance) and San Pedro News-Pilot, will put the company in contention for No. 3 spot in circulation (after Los Angeles Times and Los Angeles Herald Examiner) with the Knight-Ridder-owned Long Beach Press-Telegram and Tribune Co.-owned Daily News, Mr. Neffeler observed.

The company probably will develop an ad package allowing businesses to advertise concurrently in the Outlook and the Daily Breeze, but will keep general advertising functions of the two separate. Herbert G. Klein, editor-in-chief for all Copley newspapers, stated this intention at the time the purchase was announced. Copley has not yet decided what other changes it will make in the Outlook's operations. At presstime, the purchase was still being completed.

Cosmos Broadcasting Corp.

Cosmos Broadcasting Corp., Greenville, S.C., is the nation's 98th largest media company, with 1982 revenues of $67.5 million. It is a wholly owned subsidiary of Greenville-based Liberty Corp., a holding company that also is active in the insurance industry. The total revenues of the holding company, inclusive of Cosmos' media revenues, amounted to $264.8 million.

Cosmos consists of six network affiliated stations (five vhf and one uhf) and four radio stations (two am and two fm).

In 1982, revenues for both Cosmos and its holding company were up substantially. Cosmos' revenues were up 41% from $47.7 million in 1982, while Liberty's revenues were up 15% from $231.2 million. However, earnings failed to keep pace with the dramatic revenue growth. In fact, Liberty's earnings were down 43% from $41.3 million in 1981 to $30.9 million in 1982, while Cosmos' plummeted 68% to $1.5 million in 1982 from $4.8 million in 1981.

The growth in revenues and the drop in earnings can both be attributed to the acquisition of Orion Broadcasting on Oct. 16, 1981. The company completed the acquisition of Orion for a total financial package valued at $110 million.

Cosmos' broadcast revenues were up primarily because of the $16.9 million added by the two tv stations and two radio stations acquired from Orion. However, the drop in earnings can be attributed to the charges incurred in the acquisition. Without the revenues from the Orion properties, revenues were up only 7%. Some of the revenue weakness also arose from a weakness in local sales of advertising. However, only one station reported a decrease in total revenues compared to 1981.

The company is quick to point out that television and radio advertising tend to lag the economy in both inflationary and deflationary periods. As the economy enters an inflationary period, advertisers tend to maintain or increase advertising expenditures to maintain sales volume and reduce inventories. However, as inflation moderates, it tends to increase consumer spending generally against restricted inventories. Thus, advertisers are able to sustain sales growth without increasing advertising expenditures.

Operating expenses of Cosmos increased 57% in 1982, with the inclusion of Orion adding $16.6 million, or approximately 84% of the increase, based on a full year's operations. Included in the increase, according to the company, is approximately $4.4 million in excess depreciation and amortization. Excluding the Orion stations, expenses were up only 11%.

Among the significant changes at Cosmos in 1982 were the following:

- Personnel: A number of major station management changes were made and the general managers were given greater operating authority, responsibility and accountability. J. Law Epps, president, retired at the end of 1982 after a 28-year career in the industry. The vp in charge of radio and broadcast services is H. Lee Browning.
- Equipment: The company introduced technologically advanced, state-of-the-art equipment at a number of Cosmos stations. These new additions included earth stations for the reception of satellite signals, video-digital effects equipment, electronic still storage equipment and automated studio cameras.
- Programing: The installation of earth stations provided Cosmos with access to new programing and news sources. It hopes to achieve greater revenue growth by providing more innovative programing and by effective marketing to advertisers.

Headquarters from Columbia, S.C., and Louisville, Ky., to Greenville. The centralization of the operations is expected to help in office management functions, improved communications and reduced expenses.

The company is now contemplating a move away from its traditional media operations. It plans to operate cellular radio franchises in North Carolina if the Federal Communications Commission approves its franchise applications. The license applications are still pending FCC approval and may be some time in coming. Cellular radio applications have been filed together with American Radio and Telephone Service, and are for Greenville-Spartanburg, Columbia and Charleston, S.C.

Courier-Journal & Louisville Times Co.

Courier-Journal & Louisville Times Co. is the country's 82nd largest media company, with 1982 net operating revenues from media operations of $98 million, a 5.3% increase from media revenues of $93.1 million in 1981.

Total company revenues were $160.0 million in 1982, compared with $153.2 million in 1981. Standard Gravure, a subsidiary, is not included in media figures.

The company is moving full speed ahead in its new ventures; primarily through its CJ&T Teletext projects. The system broadcasts both news and classified advertising 24 hours a day, over leased channels on Times Mirror and Storer cable systems.

With the potential of reaching 110,000 cable subscribers, the channel's revenues have been running 20% ahead of projections, according to John L. Richards, senior vp.

During its first year, CJ&T Channel concentrated on private party advertising sold through its newspapers' classified phone room. Almost 3,000 daily "pages" of classifieds are being broadcast. There is now a new rate card and a cable salesperson to encourage contract advertisers. Mr. Richards said, "The jury is still out on the marriage of cable and newspaper activities. We're not sure where we stand, but we know we have to be in this area."

Sounding a more optimistic note, Mr. Richards said, "The teletext field is promising." CJ&T Teletext is testing the French Antiope technology in approximately 150 Louisville area households. The project has been testing both classified and display advertising.

Display comes from local ad agencies testing their clients' messages free of charge through the newspapers' agency roundtable. The project, which began in mid-1982, is scheduled to wind up this July. Mr. Richards noted, "Our traditional products won't be given up but these are other ways to protect our territory—with the transmission of both headline and classified ads."

On a more traditional note, the newspapers have strengthened their distribution system through the use of zoned products. Two were introduced in 1982, and another two have been launched this year. Mr. Richards said there is the possibility of "a few more products" in the Louisville SMSA, but said he believes five products serve the needs of both readers and advertisers in terms of total market coverage.

In 1982 the newspapers also filed for cellular radio licenses. Applications are before the Federal Communications Commission for Louisville, West Palm Beach/Boca Raton, Fla., and Austin, Tex. Other markets are being considered. Mr. Richards said, "In 1984 we will continue to broaden our scope, but remain in those fields where we have proven expertise. Zoned newspapers are an extension of our product; with cable we are still focusing on information and cellular licenses represent a step into diversification."

Cowles Media Co.

Cowles Media Co. is the nation's 39th largest media company with revenues of $238.0 million for fiscal 1982, ended February, 1982. All revenues were from media operations.

Net earnings plunged 89% from fiscal 1981 to $747,000 from $7 million, largely because of series of onetime charges stemming from the merger of the Minneapolis Star and Minneapolis Tribune.

Although fiscal 1983 concluded this March, for consistency the figures used to rank Cowles in this issue are for the fiscal 1982. For the more recent fiscal 1983, Cowles had revenues of $228.0 million, compared with $238.0 million for 1982. Additionally, operating earnings were $9 million, compared with $2.4 million for fiscal 1982, while after-tax net earnings saw a loss of $531,000, compared with a gain of $747,000.

Again it was a series of onetime charges that brought on the decline. The closing of the Buffalo Courier-Express yielded an $8.1 million charge while other personnel-related charges totaled a $4.1 million charge.

Those charges were offset some by the sale of Cowles' Wichita tv station for $5.6 million, and in addition the company won a Supreme Court case against the state of Minnesota that resulted in a $5.2 million rebate. The company had fought a state tax on newsprint.

The Minneapolis concern's retrenchment program continues. It goes on beating a hasty retreat from an ill-conceived acquisition binge (which occurred during the 1970s) and is attempting to shore up the sagging profits of the mainstay Minneapolis Star & Tribune newspaper. In March, the afternoon Star and morning Tribune were merged to create the Minneapolis Star & Tribune.

Last year Cowles Media made some dramatic high-level personnel changes at the Minneapolis newspaper.

But, as in the previous year, the changes were tainted by controversy—a trait that has recently become the venerable company's hallmark.

The most recent shuffle took place in February, when Cowles Media's board pressured John Cowles Jr. into resigning as president of the parent company and publisher of the Minneapolis Star & Tribune, and replaced him with his cousin, David Kruidenier. Mr. Cowles, grandson of company founder Gardner Cowles, had only claimed the latter post in November after firing publisher Donald Dwight.

At the time, Mr. Cowles' grasping of the publisher's reins was viewed by many as a reluctant admission that the flagship had been allowed to wander too far from the company's eye during Mr. Dwight's regime.

Former and current staffers charged that the paper had become increasingly factionalized and politicized under Mr. Dwight and that he was responsible for covering up plans for the merger, which had been rumored for nearly a year before actually taking place. Mr. Dwight's backers said that he was only following a mandate from the board and Mr. Cowles.

For the past two years a sequence of chaotic events—highlighted by the resignation in protest of editor Charles Bailey—had radically hurt the paper's image. Mr. Bailey resigned to protest another series of layoffs in which 59 editorial workers would be dismissed. Earlier layoffs affected nearly 100 people.

In November, shortly after Mr. Bailey's resignation, the high level shifts began. Christopher Burns, the associate publisher who directed much of the Star and Tribune merger, left the paper because of "philosophical differences" with Mr. Dwight. On the heels of his departure, the controversial Mr. Dwight was fired by Mr. Cowles.

When Mr. Cowles became publisher he vowed to fill the key posts of ad and circulation directors, two positions that had been vacant for 18 months because of early retirements. He also set out to reverse a belief within the community that the newspaper was operating without direction.

In addition, Mr. Cowles said renewed emphasis would be placed on the profitability of all assets and suggested that entities that did not make the grade would be cut loose. Cowles had already divested itself of 33% of Harper & Row, Harper's and a tv station, KTVH in Wichita. Still on the block is a tv station in Louisville, Ky., and a chain of Denver weeklies.

Mr. Cowles' abrupt departure has not altered that back-to-basics business philosophy. Mr. Kruidenier, who is chairman of the Des Moines Register and Tribune Co., which owns 13% of Cowles Media, voiced the same retrenchment goals when he took over.

But board members reportedly ousted Mr. Cowles because he moved too late to deal with the troubles of the Minneapolis newspaper and resented his attempts to revitalize the Star.

Some charged that as president Mr. Cowles neglected company business and channeled his actions into too many civic causes, including the construction of the Hubert H. Humphery domed stadium in downtown Minneapolis.

There are doubts that Mr. Kruidenier can lead the company to its former glory days. His own company has suffered declining profits and it recently closed down its afternoon paper, the Des Moines Tribune.

Roger Parkinson, who came to the Minnesota paper as assistant publisher and is the former publisher of the defunct Buffalo Courier-Express, followed Mr. Cowles as publisher. One of Mr. Parkinson's first acts was to name Joel Kramer, former editor of the Buffalo Courier-Express, as editor of the Minneapolis paper.

In September, the last issue of the Courier-Express rolled off the presses as Cowles shut down the paper that had lost an estimated $25 million since it was purchased in 1979.

The 148-year-old daily was offered to press baron Rupert Murdoch, but the 1,100 Courier-Express employes could not come to terms with Mr. Murdoch on payroll cuts and other contract concessions. The demise of the morning paper leaves Buffalo with only the afternoon Buffalo News.

When Cowles Media, then known as the Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co., purchased the paper from the William J. Connors family, it also bought its subsidiary cable tv system for $30 million. The value of Cablescope is estimated at more than $50 million, an appreciation that helped to offset the losses incurred at the paper.

Cox Communications

Cox Communications Inc., Atlanta, is the country's 20th largest media company with media revenues of $477.5 million, or 93% of the company's total revenues of $514.7 million. In 1981, Cox had media revenues of $370.2 million, or 92% of total company revenues of $403.5 million. The 1982 revenues were 29% higher than the previous year.

Total operating income rose 13%, from $104.9 million in 1981 to $118.2 million in 1982.

Revenues from cable television contributed $261.5 million or 55% of total media revenues, up 39% from 1981 revenues of $188.5 million. Revenues from broadcasting rose 19% to $216.1 million from $181.7 million in 1981.

Operating income from cable tv was $37.7 million, up 24% from $30.9 million in 1981. By contrast, operating income from broadcasting was up 14%, to $76.0 million from $66.6 million.

The company's 1982 revenues and earnings both were records. Company president William A. Schwartz said the growth was paced by the performance of the cable television group and most of the broadcasting operations.

There were some weak spots, however. Radio revenues were down 1% to $34.7 million. The company is trying to improve audience share and demographics through major format changes at three stations and refinements at three others.

Cox abandoned its newest broadcasting venture, subscription television (stv) in February. The stv service, which was introduced over KDNL-TV in St. Louis, attracted fewer subscribers than originally anticipated, and long-term projections showed the company that continued operation would be economically unsound.

Even cable television had its problems. Though subscriber sales goals were met, there was a very high turnover among subscribers.

The company admits that it was unable to reach the service levels needed to retain more customers, particularly for premium services. Among the reasons cited were the lack of product differentiation among the various movie channels and delays in the delivery of converter equipment.

Early in 1983, the National Black Media Coalition filed a complaint with the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) charging that 22 Cox cable systems weren't complying with equal employment opportunity guidelines, and only one franchise had satisfied EEOC guidelines in all respects. A Cox spokesman said the charges are unfounded.

During 1982 Cox reviewed its operations and reaffirmed the following strategies:

- It will aggressively search for a full complement of seven tv stations, firm in the belief that tv will continue to play a dominant role in media.

Cox, in fact, is purchasing for $17 million in cash WKBD-TV, Detroit, from Field Enterprises, which is divesting itself of broadcast and media properties. That would give the company the seven stations permitted. However, Cox may be required to sell its cable operations owned in the Detroit station's tv coverage area.

- It will selectively seek to upgrade the radio group through acquisitions.
- It plans to focus on franchising and acquisition of major cable systems and also consider swaps in order to achieve larger subscriber clusters.
- It plans to seek a role in emerging telecommunications areas, such as satellite distribution, cellular radio and similar services.
- The company intends to increase its role in entertainment production and distribution.

In 1983, Cox expects solid tv ratings to lead to increased television profits. In addition, the continuation of a major program of cable franchise construction and acquisition is expected to add new subscribers and increase profits.

At the end of 1982, Cox Cable Communications had a total of 1.29 million subscribers, which represented a compounded annual growth rate of almost 21% since 1977. Pay subscriptions increased 29% over 1981 to a total of 1.27 million.

Cox gained no new franchises in 1982. However, after unsuccessfully negotiating with the city of Marquette, Mich., to renew its 6,500-subscriber franchise, it filed a complaint for damages and equitable relief in the U.S. District Court in Michigan. It subsequently decided not to pursue the matter and withdrew the complaint.

In March, it lost in its bid for the 280,000-home franchise in Baltimore to Caltec Cablevision. Even though Cox had been considered the frontrunner in the race for Baltimore, Caltec's plan for local ownership is said to have clinched their win.

Cox Cable was involved in two significant cable projects in 1981-82. In San Diego it began participating in a commercial videotex service, together with American Can subsidiaries ViewMart and HomServ. Later it introduced a similar service in Omaha, Neb.

Recently, however, American Can has announced its intention to withdraw from the joint venture. Cox has not indicated whether it will terminate the project or look for another working partner.

Cox Cable is also involved in COMMLINE, an institutional business communications network. Introduced in Omaha last June, COMMLINE serves businesses, municipal users, social and health agencies by providing extensive data and video communications services.

In May, Cox and ABC Video Enterprises announced a joint venture to examine the full range of home entertainment via cable tv, including pay-per-view. The venture launched a pilot project, FirsTicket, in the Santa Barbara and San Diego area. Subscribers are equipped with one-way addressable or two-way interactive converters and are offered select motion pictures and other special events on a pay-per-view basis.

Cox, along with Times Mirror, TCI and Storer, continues to be a partner in the Spotlight programing service. Another partner, Cablevision, recently decided not to remain with the venture.

Tv provided the real impetus for growth in broadcasting. WHIO-TV in Dayton, O., dominates that market, with a total day share equaling the combined share of the other two network affiliates. In early and late news, the station nearly doubles the combined share of the network rivals.

Charlotte's WSOC-TV has made major competitive strides against the traditional number one station in that market. The company said WSOC-TV is in a virtual tie for first place in late news. WSB-TV in Atlanta, which switched from NBC to ABC two years ago, closed out the year as the top station in its market.

TeleRep, Cox's national tv sales representation company, and Cox are partners with Taft and Paramount in the production of "Entertainment Tonight," a daily satellite-fed show that is seen on 130 stations across the country.

Cox chairman Clifford Kirtland, 59, resigned effective June 1. The move seemed to catch some company executives and industry analysts by surprise. However, senior Cox officials claim that the departure had been planned for more than a year and a half and that the news had just been publicized.

Cox Enterprises

Cox Enterprises, Atlanta, is the nation's 21st largest media company, with 1982 revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE at more than $425.0 million, all from media properties. Cox Enterprises had estimated media revenues in 1981 of $419.5 million.

With the Atlanta Journal and Constitution as its flagship, the family-owned chain operates dailies in 13 cities and several weeklies in suburban New Orleans and in Texas. It also has shoppers in Colorado, Florida and Arizona, and its Palm Beach Life magazine claims the title of America's oldest society journal.

The company seems poised to jump into the arena of electronic media. Although it hasn't revealed specific plans, it recently hired Maurice Schonfeld as its director of development. Mr. Schonfeld, formerly an architect of Cable News Network (CNN) and CNN2 for Turner Broadcasting System in Atlanta, will "examine electronic opportunities for us," a Cox spokesman said.

Cox already has gone into the business of cable news programing in a couple of its newspaper markets. In Waco, Tex., it offers a channel of teletext news and classified advertising via a partnership with MetroVision, the cable operator there.

And in Longview, Tex., Cox built a tv studio in its newspaper office, from which it produces two live news shows daily for showing on its cable news channel. The company said it's negotiating similar arrangements in some of the other cities where it has newspapers.

The chain's total daily newspaper circulation in March, 1983, amounted to 1.251 million. The star performers of the group have been the papers in Atlanta, Austin and Palm Beach. At the other end of the spectrum, the Dayton, O., dailies and a couple of smaller properties in Texas have suffered some circulation losses because of problems in the local economies.

The Atlanta Journal and Constitution, with combined daily circulation of 397,618 for the six-month period ended March 31, benefited when the economy of that city began to turn around late in 1982 and in the first quarter of 1983, according to Cox president Charles Glover.

"We've also put a lot of effort into improving the editorial product in Atlanta," he said.

The Atlanta papers last year introduced a marriage-mail system in which they offer preprint advertisers total market coverage through a combination of direct distribution to Sunday subscribers and direct mail to nonsubscribers.

Ferguson Rood, advertising and sales vp, said the program, called REACH, became profitable within three months of its inception.

He said the papers also recently added two new sections, a special local Monday "Business" section, and on Fridays, a Hollywood-style "Preview" section covering movie news.

Early in 1982, the Journal and Constitution merged news staffs while retaining their separate identities and distinct a.m. and p.m. schedules. Atlanta Newspapers president Tom Wood was replaced by David Easterly, formerly vp of the parent company.

The entry of USA Today also had an effect on the papers. Cox officials insist the national newspaper, which made Atlanta its second target market, had only "minimal" impact on their street sales.

But when USA Today announced it was coming to town, "it caused us to accelerate some of the things we already planned to do." Mr. Glover said. "Their prototypes showed how they'd use graphics and color and we reacted." In Austin and Palm Beach, the papers are thriving because they're located in "tremendous growth markets," Mr. Glover said, "and because we're continuing to fine-tune the editorial products."

Several other Florida Gulf Coast publications (including the Tribune Co.'s Fort Lauderdale News and Knight-Ridder Newspaper's Miami Herald) compete with Cox in the Palm Beach area, but Cox apparently likes the fertile Florida markets.

The company last year made a strong bid to buy the Florida Publishing Co., with its Jacksonville Journal and three other dailies. The group eventually went to Morris Communications Group of Augusta, Ga., but Cox was one of the four final bidders.

"Of course we're interested in diversification into some other media areas, but we also have a great deal of faith in print, and we'll continue to look for good newspaper acquisitions," Mr. Glover said.

Other Cox dailies in Florida include the Miami News (which has a joint operating agreement with the Miami Herald) and 47.5% interest in the Daytona Beach Journal and News.

Dayton, O., is a sore spot in Cox's newspaper lineup. Its morning Daily News and evening Journal-Herald had circulations of 102,000 and 121,000, respectively, in March. In this, Cox's second-largest market, both papers have declining circulation because the area lost more than 30,000 manufacturing jobs during the last 10 years.

The newspapers in Port Arthur, Tex., were hurt by a petrochemical strike there, and the Lufkin, Tex. paper currently is feeling the effect of gluts in the paper and oil industries.

However, two other Texas markets—Waco and Longview—are doing extremely well, Cox officials said.

Deseret Management Corp.

Deseret Management Corp., Salt Lake City, is the nation's 87th largest media company, thanks to wholly owned subsidiary Bonneville International Corp. Through ownership of two tv stations, four am and seven fm radio stations and half ownership in a Logan, Utah, cable tv system, Bonneville took in $89.0 million in net revenues in 1982, up from a $71.9 million in 1981.

In 1982, Bonneville furnished about 85% of Deseret's total revenues of $104.7 million, according to the subsidiary's senior vp, Blaine Whipple. Total revenues the year before came in at $84.5 million.

Deseret, a closed corporation wholly owned by the Corp. of the President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, derived nonmedia revenues from television production and radio services.

Bonneville's properties, which range from Seattle to New York, garnered revenues as follows: 49.7% from tv; 45.8% from radio; 2.2% from satellite broadcasting, and 2.3% from program syndication via Bonneville Broadcast Systems.

The church also owns a print operation represented by a daily paper, the Deseret News, with a circulation of 72,000 in the Salt Lake City market. The paper, however, does not fall under Deseret management.

Not yet a money maker, but a performer with promise, is Bonneville's teletext operation, KIRO Teletext, launched by KIRO-TV in Seattle. The CBS affiliate has been beaming the teletext electronic news and information service 24 hours a day since June, 1982.

But as of this writing the effort is still experimental; only 10 to 20 sets in the greater Seattle area are equipped with decoders to receive it, and those can be found in demonstration centers, according to Jim Johnson, vp-marketing and planning for KIRO Inc.

A key factor here is hardware, said Mr. Johnson, who noted that CBS has been shown interest in his station's endeavor. Until very recently, he said, there was no incentive for electronics companies to make the decoders, because FCC clearance for such a service was lacking.

KIRO Teletext had been operating under temporary FCC authorization. But in April, 1983, the FCC authorized certain vertical blanking lines in the broadcast spectrum for use by teletext services, opening a door for growth—if companies line up to make decoders and customers line up to buy them.

Mr. Johnson is optimistic about that potential, saying that KIRO research has unearthed a lively consumer interest in the service. Potential subscribers have been found willing to pay up to $100 for the needed receiving equipment—a one-shot expense. There would be no monthly charge for the teletext service.

KIRO Teletext has set up public demonstrations in the home electronics departments of Frederick & Nelson, a major Seattle department store chain. Another demonstration is running in Northgate, one of Seattle's largest shopping malls. The demonstrations have been promoted by broadcast spots on KIRO's tv and am radio station and its co-owned station KSEA (fm).

Whether KIRO Teletext will roll as an independent venture, or move under the wing of CBS's teletext venture Extravision, will be decided "within the next two to three months," Mr. Johnson said.

Des Moines Register & Tribune Co.

Des Moines Register and Tribune Co., Des Moines, Ia., is the nation's 86th largest media company with 1982 operating revenues of $90.6 million from the previous year's $89.4 million. Total media earnings were $1.47 million from $3.4 million, a loss of $816,007. The privately held company earned $277,638 in 1981.

The significant earnings loss stems from the a series of one-time charges deriving from last year's closing of the afternoon Des Moines Tribune and the lingering effects of a depressed midwestern economy.

Total revenues were $94.5 million, compared with 1981's $92.6 million.

The company played its trump card in June, 1982, when it closed the evening Tribune and laid off an estimated 200 people from the 1,030 work force. The move was made in order to improve the company's eroding profit margins and to consolidate corporate efforts behind the morning Register, which has stronger circulation and a statewide reader and advertising base. The Tribune's coverage and ads were confined to Des Moines metroplitan area.

The Register has seen its circulation numbers jump to an estimated 250,000, a bit over the projected 240,000 predicted at the time of the Tribune's closing.

In an attempt to improve profit the company divested itself of Wisconsin-based Waukesha Freeman, which was sold to Thomson Newspapers Ltd., Des Plaines, Ill., and KLAK and KPPL-FM which were sold to the Malrite Communications Group.

In the wake of the Tribune's end came a series of high-level changes at the Register. David Kruidenier continues as chairman of the company, but relinquished his publisher's role to Gary Gerlach, formerly executive vp-general counsel. Michael Gartner continues as president and adds the title of editorial chairman.

Mr. Gartner was succeeded as editor of the paper by James Gannon, formerly executive editor of the Register and Tribune. Charles Edwards was named ad director succeeding David Tibbetts, who resigned.

Last February Mr. Kruidenier was named chairman of the Cowles Media Co. replacing John Cowles Jr., who resigned under pressure from the Cowles Media board. The Des Moines Register & Tribune Co. owns 13% of Cowles Media, and Mr. Kruidenier is a cousin of Mr. Cowles.

Mr. Kruidenier's installment again ignites long-running speculation that Cowles Media, which publishes the Minneapolis Star & Tribune, and the Des Moines concern will merge. In 1981 the two companies agreed to merge but could not come to terms. Mr. Kruidenier says the merger is always a possibility but that it is on the "far back burner."

Dispatch Printing Co.

Dispatch Printing Co., Columbus, O., owned by members of the local Wolfe family, is the 68th largest media company with revenues estimated at $127.2 million in 1982, all from media operations. The company had total revenues of $110.4 million in 1981, all from media.

The major property in the group is the Columbus Dispatch, which accounts for an estimated 78% of revenues. Other properties include WBSN-TV in Columbus and WTHR-TV in Indianapolis.

The Dispatch, founded in 1871, was purchased in 1905 by two Wolfe brothers, the grandfather and great uncle of current board chairman John Walton Wolfe. Day-to-day operations are supervised by Mr. Wolfe's cousin, John F. Wolfe, 39, publisher and president.

The Dispatch, an evening paper that handles advertising, circulation and other noneditorial functions for E.W. Scripps' morning Citizen-Journal, had Audit Bureau of Circulations-audited daily circulation in the March, 1983, reporting period of 206,853 and Sunday circulation of 350,203, up 2.3% and up 2.9%, respectively, from 1982.

Its editorial competitor, the Citizen-Journal, for the same period had daily circulation of 121,824, up 4% from 1982. The Citizen-Journal does not publish on Sunday.

The Dispatch, an evening paper, bucks national trends that show declining circulation in evening newspapers in markets where they compete with a morning daily.

The company recently underwent a management change that has "given management greater flexibility in hours and scheduling," says Richard M. Franks, vp-operations.

Specifically, district managers (field reps) were converted to first-level management, wresting that responsibility from union control.

The newspaper "has felt the slump in the economy like other newspapers, although linage this year is ahead of projections," said Mr. Franks, who credited the improvement in linage to the improved economy and to the increased emphasis on staff sales presentations.

The leading broadcast property is WBNS-TV, founded by the Dispatch Printing Co. in 1949 in Columbus. The CBS affiliate is the dominant news station in its market with a 43% share of audience for the late news slot, according to the February, 1983, Arbitron monitoring period, and a 52% share of audience for the early news.

Journal's pick adds continental flavor

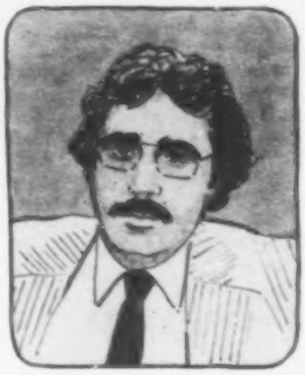
By Dennis Chase

When Norman Pearlstine settles in as the new managing editor of the Wall Street Journal on Sept. 1, he can be forgiven if he has the feeling that his new job is a piece of cake.

Not since about 1976 has the mustachioed, 40-year-old editor, one of the fastest-rising stars at Dow Jones & Co., been asked to do anything at Dow Jones except start fledgling, English-language publications in foreign countries, where the distribution, production and editorial problems—not to mention the stiff competition—are immense. So when Mr. Pearlstine now says, "I don't plan any great changes at the Journal," the sentence must sound strange even to Mr. Pearlstine himself.

"In the past six years the Journal has been changed and become very strong: The circulation has increased over 30% and there's a bigger news hole now that we've gone to two sections," he says. "It's a game plan of Larry O'Donnell [Mr. Pearlstine's predecessor] that is begging to be followed. I'm very reluctant to change it."

No doubt one reason Mr. Pearlstine was tapped for the spot was his international background, and there will be changes. He is looking to increase and improve the Journal's international coverage, trying to "make it more systematic, like our domestic coverage," he says.



Pearlstine: Not locked into a preconception.

But that raises the problem—which Mr. Pearlstine will be grappling with—of how to make coverage of financial results of foreign companies interesting to U.S. readers. "The question is, how significant is day-to-day international corporate coverage, and how can we make that story right for the Wall Street Journal audience, which is so much a domestic audience?" he asks.

What is in the cards, however, is more space devoted to international stories not tied just to political events.

He also says the Journal will continue to look at "compartmentalization" of the news and at graphics "so that, as the paper gets bigger, the reader is still able to embrace it."

Besides his international experience, one of Mr. Pearlstine's qualifications is that he has come through some of the toughest assignments ever laid on an editor. From 1976 to 1978, he was the managing editor of the Asian Wall Street Journal, a publication that for years many outsiders thought was Dow Jones' biggest blunder. That's because it struggled through massive startup problems in an unfamiliar and highly competitive market. Only last year, nearly six years after its birth, did the Asian Journal start to make money.

In fact, Mr. Pearlstine left Dow Jones to become an executive editor at Forbes from 1978 to 1980. But he returned as the U.S. Journal's national news editor until last year, when he took on perhaps his toughest assignment of all.

Mr. Pearlstine was named the first editor and publisher of the Wall Street Journal/Europe, which, since it started on Jan. 31, has been taking on the heavyweights of international publishing—the Financial Times and the International Herald Tribune—right in their own European backyards.

To even Mr. Pearlstine's surprise, the battle in Europe so far has been easier than expected. This month he announced that unaudited figures so far showed the WSJ/E had reached a circulation of 17,500, or 10,000 more than the previous international air edition. By comparison, the Asian Journal took six years to reach just 25,000.

The newspaper runs an average three pages of ads each issue. While Mr. Pearlstine and other executives have been stressing the quality rather than quantity of the circulation, that could change if the numbers keep rising faster than original projections. Despite that good news, before leaving his post Mr. Pearlstine was still tinkering, which is his hallmark. He recently adjusted the contents of the European Journal, following a lesson that was drilled into him during his experience with the Asian Journal: Be flexible.

Two months ago he radically changed to a horizontal layout and increased the coverage of U.S. business. "We'll do a readership study before the end of the year," he says. "We're not locked into a preconception."

Dennis Chase is international editor of ADVERTISING AGE.

plete live units, 12 news cars and a helicopter combing the market. The chopper, for example, recently was used to relay live from New Concord, 58 miles east of Columbus, coverage of Democratic Sen. John H. Glenn Jr.'s announcement that he was running for the presidency in 1984.

WTHR, the NBC television affiliate in Indianapolis, was bought by Wolfe family interests in 1975, and falls under the corporate head of VideoIndiana Inc. The station has not been a leader in the race for market share in Indianapolis, where it currently is in third place. But the company is "painstakingly building" the station into a contender, said Eugene D'Angelo Jr., president and general manager-broadcasting operations at Dispatch Printing Co.

He notes the station now has the same newsgathering capabilities as its Columbus sister station. The payoff may have already begun. The station won an Emmy in 1982 for its documentary on the resurgence of the Klu Klux Klan.

A third broadcast property, WBNS am, fm in Columbus, is owned by the Wolfe family but is not included under the Dispatch Printing Co. corporate umbrella. Its revenues are not included in company estimates.

Donrey Media Group

Donrey Media Group, Fort Smith, Ark., is the nation's 60th largest media company with media revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE of $147.4 million in 1982.

A privately held company with all of its interests in media operations, Donrey serves more than 8 million people through its 46 daily and 41 nondaily newspapers, one tv and seven radio stations, four cable companies and 11 outdoor advertising plants. The group owns companies in 18 states and the District of Columbia. "It was a respectable year," said Fred Smith, Donrey's executive vp. "Revenues were not what we would like, but we did a good job of controlling our expenses."

Acquisition and development characterized 1982 for the company. Early in the year Donrey took control of two cable systems, Rogers Cablevision in Rogers, Ark. and Bartlesville Video in Bartlesville, Okla. The company already owned 20% of the Bartlesville system at the time of the sale in February.

Also in February, 1982, Donrey acquired the Valley Publishing Co., publisher of three daily newspapers in Kent, Renton and Auburn, suburbs of Seattle. The dailies have a combined circulation of 40,000, and three complementary twice-weekly controlled-distribution publications extend circulation to 100,000. A purchase price was never disclosed.

The company's most recent acquisition was the Chico (Cal.) Enterprise-Record, a daily with a circulation of 26,000. The sale became final April 1.

Mr. Smith said the company continues to be interested in media acquisitions, particularly newspapers in its 5,000 to 105,000 circulation range. And, he added, "we are very, very interested in cable."

In March, 1982, the company's West Hawaii Today went from thrice-weekly to daily publication as part of an over-all face lift that included construction of a new printing facility. Similarly, a new printing plant for the Glasgow Daily Times is currently under construction.

In cable, both the Bartlesville and Rogers systems have begun upgrading from standard 12-channel operations to ones that will handle more than 30 channels.

At the Bartlesville system, the company is experimenting with two teletext channels that will combine alphanumeric information with live and videotape programing. The project is a cooperative effort between the cable company and the Bartlesville Examiner-Enterprise, also a Donrey property.

The company remains committed to continued growth and to pioneering technology, according to its founder and president, Donald W. Reynolds. The group has contributed to research on a laser platemaker that is now in operation at Donrey's largest newspaper, the Las Vegas (Nev.) Review Journal in Las Vegas, Nev. The company is also developing a computerized circulation system at that location.

Dow Jones & Co.

Dow Jones & Co., New York, is the country's 14th largest media company, with media operation revenues of $683.0 million in 1982, or 94% of total revenues of $730.7 million. In 1981, its media revenues were $600.0 million, or 94% of total revenues of $641.0 million.

National publications and news services accounted for more than three quarters of total revenues. Community newspapers, book publishing and information services accounted for the remainder. Information Services and Book Publishing were not included in ADVERTISING AGE's figures.

Net income rose from $71.4 million in 1981 to $88.0 million in 1982.

The company's principal publication, the Wall Street Journal, launched its European edition with a bang. The publication's first two issues sold out all available advertising space and circulation began growing faster than it did for the launch of the Asian Wall Street Journal six years ago.

Estimates were that 35 U.S. advertisers were going to take out strong schedules while a smaller group of European advertisers were going to go into the paper.

Norman Pearlstine, former publisher and editor of the Wall Street Journal/Europe, has chosen to take a low-key approach. (See story above left). "We feel pretty good about what we are doing," he said. In May, Mr. Pearlstine was promoted to managing editor of the Journal, replacing Laurence G. O'Donnell, who was named associate editor of the Journal.

While Dow Jones executives were taking a low profile concerning the European paper, they were obviously pleased with the results of a direct-mail circulation drive that began last October. That effort apparently netted a strong response. Sources guessed the publication would start with better than 10,000 initial circulation and rapidly move to 12,000. It appears certain that the European Journal will reach 25,000 in less than six years, a shorter period of time than it took the Asian edition to reach the same mark.

Meanwhile, Dow Jones was planning to make changes at home in the Journal, which generates approximately 67% of the company's profits. The company announced plans for a daily half-page of arts and leisure coverage in the Wall Street Journal to debut in the fall.

Journal executives have said privately that when the paper's capacity expands to 60 pages later this year, they planned to use much of that extra space for coverage of the arts and to allow for more commentary.

The new and still unnamed page is expected to debut in September and will be edited by Raymond Sokolov, editor of Book Digest before Dow Jones folded that publication last year. Mr. Sokolov is now editor of the Arts and Leisure page that appears in the Friday editions of the Journal. The daily section, which will have its own logo, will appear on the left-hand page directly preceding the editorial pages of the Journal. It is expected that the arts coverage that now appears on the Op-Ed page of the Journal will be replaced by more letters to the editors and commentary by Journal staffers.

"We think that there is a lot in this area, especially in books, that we should be doing more of," said George Melloan, deputy editor and coordinator of much of the change that is to take place.

Barron's, Dow Jones national weekly, was also making changes as it began publishing a western edition in January. If successful, the move would pave the way for the eventual introduction of other regional editions, according to ad director Walter Dietzer.

Mr. Dietzer said that Barron's like its sister publication, the Journal, came to the conclusion that it must regionalize to develop new advertising prospects.

On the video front, Dow Jones Information Services president William Dunn said that the online Dow Jones Information Retrieval Service now serves 55,000 customer terminals, up from 30,000 last year, and has expanded the agreements with 10 multiple system operators to introduce the service via cable to systems passing 360,000 homes to cover 20 mso's and 1.25 million homes passed.

In the area of tv, the "Wall Street Journal Report," co-produced by Dow Jones and WPIX, debuted on tv in October and is being shown in 52 markets across the country.

Frederick Taylor, the Journal's executive editor, said the newspaper had been approached many times in the past to lend its name and resources to a business show. WPIX was selected as a partner because Journal executives wanted to retain editorial control.

"It didn't seem likely that we'd end up in a joint venture with one of the networks," Mr. Taylor said. "They want control themselves."

Although both sides contribute suggestions for stories, most ideas originate from the pages of the Journal. An editorial board with representatives from both sides has been set up to review stories at every stage of development.

John R. Corporon, executive producer of the program, anticipated that the show would be sold out in the fourth quarter. WPIX sells three minutes and local stations sell three minutes. WPIX is charging $12,500 for a 30-second spot.

Life after battle on Detroit's front line

By Jay McCormick

Things can get a little rough in Detroit's newspaper jousts.

And a little tedious.

A little too tedious for Bill Giles, who had been brought in by the Detroit News to improve editorial quality and fight off Detroit Free Press' Knight-Ridder in shining armor. Laying down his lance as top editor at the News, Mr. Giles left the field with the battle only half over.

The sudden resignation caught officials of the Evening News Assn., the News' parent, by surprise (though rumors started immediately that it was their idea in the first place). The story hit the front pages of both papers the next day, and Lionel Linder, Mr. Giles' right-hand man at the News and before that at Dow Jones & Co.'s National Observer, stepped up to take the reins of the News. Bill Giles faded from sight.

Reposing at home in Grosse Pointe Park, a suburb of Detroit, Mr. Giles tends to look at the Detroit newspaper war with the sardonic eye of a character from a stormy Icelandic saga. "The house is on fire and you're fighting," he says. "You're constantly using your mental powers and physical powers and reporting powers to make certain that you're not getting snookered by the competition."

Mr. Giles admits he has a somewhat idealistic vision of what a newspaper should do by way of public service. Under his tutelage, the News won the Pulitzer prize for meritorious public service in 1982 for a series of stories on punishment and brig practices in the Navy. The story started as an ordinary obit assignment on the death of a Detroit-area crew member.

Dissemination of information alone just doesn't do it for Mr. Giles. The Navy stories caused changes in that service's rules and practices and the early retirement of some of the officers involved, he points out proudly.

Giles: An idealistic vision

But with the recession hitting the newspapers in Detroit, the news hole started to shrink, stories were squeezed and hiring limits were imposed. The ambitious improvement plan Mr. Giles had been hired to command was put on hold. "There was a continuing problem of trying to make the economics jibe with the effort to improve the quality of the newspaper," Mr. Giles says.

Ironically, the recession held down what could have been helpful coverage by the News of the bad economy in Michigan. The paper couldn't perform the needed public service. "We could report the stupid statistics, do feature stories about people getting thrown out of tent city in Houston. After you do that for three years, you say, 'What is the function now?' " Mr. Giles says, "Plus I'm depressed . . . that the newspaper can be an observer but didn't strike me as being an instrument of usefulness at that point. That bothered me, as a professional and as a person."

In addition to the recession, the competition between the papers held down the level of most stories, Mr. Giles says.

"Does the art or science of journalism get advanced by this kind of competition? I seriously doubt it," Mr. Giles says. "The newspapers are so obliged to keep performing in front of the market out there—you keep watching the stupid competition. If they do a mental hospital story, you're looking for something to counter that. Mental hospital stories have been done every year for the last 50 years."

Linder: Locked in a race

Some of that is still true, according to Lionel Linder. Mr. Linder stepped up to the editor post from executive editor, where he had been in charge of long-range planning. "The battle is quite intense at all times and on all levels," says Mr. Linder. "There's no question it is a race. The fierce competition is enervating."

But Mr. Linder, unlike Mr. Giles, tries to keep himself out of the race, leaving the day-to-day operations to his staff. "I treat [the competition] differently than he did. I don't take it all so personally. My blood pressure doesn't rise with every move the Free Press makes," says Mr. Linder.

Messrs. Linder and Giles worked together for 20 years, at the National Observer and the News, so it's not surprising that Mr. Linder plans to keep 95% of the changes Mr. Giles made while editor of the News. That includes giving big play to longer stories or series on unusual subjects with local slants.

"Perhaps some [of the staff] liked Bill's flamboyant style more than my professorial style, if that's the word," Mr. Linder adds. But he points out that the News didn't lose a step when Mr. Giles quit. "They knew there was a successor," says Mr. Linder.

If newspapers want to stay alive, if they want to continue to attract intelligent and talented young writers and be read for more than bare-bones information, they must change, according to Mr. Giles. "I don't know what the answers are, but [newspapers] don't have them," he says. "People are very content, journalists, professors as well as editors and publishers are very content to go with what they've got.

"You need something better than that. Don't ask what it is at this point—but it isn't going to come out of Detroit, I'm convinced.

"And it isn't going to come out of the sense that competition in some fashion is going to be so good that it is going to churn up these marvelous new ideas in journalism."

Mr. Giles says he will probably go back to a university in Michigan to work to make journalism classes and programs better and more respectable. He plans to do some consulting work with private business, he adds. He spent a year at Baylor University in Texas teaching and gathering his thoughts between his jobs at Dow Jones and the News.

Even in the continued soft economy, D&B held strong. In 1982, all four segments of D&B's empire—Business Information Services, Publishing, Marketing Services and Broadcasting—showed revenue and profit gains, however slight.

According to D&B, its strategy focuses on an increased application of technology, and its future centers on a commitment "to searching constantly for new product needs and new markets."

Last month, however, D&B put five of its six Corinthian Broadcasting tv stations on the block. No asking price was disclosed, but industry sources estimate the five stations could fetch $300 million. The largest Corinthian station, KHOU-TV, Houston, is not for sale yet, but the company plans to sell it at a later date. Proceeds from the sale will be invested in existing lines of business.

In 1982, Corinthian's revenues hit all-time highs, and according to the latest ratings, two of Corinthian's stations, KOTV-TV in Tulsa and WISH-TV in Indianapolis, rank No. 1 in their markets for both prime time and the entire day.

The TVS Television Network had a slight revenue gain and an operating income decline. The station's position as "packager and producer of college basketball games for tv was hurt by the escalating rights payments for tv sports," according to the company. Also, several of the network's sports programs resulted in red ink on the bottom line.

Corinthian was hard at work last year completing construction of satellite uplink facilities at Corinithian stations, enabling immediate broadcast of national news of local interest to stations from Corinthian's Washington D.C. bureau. Several stations also unveiled their new program, "Afternoon," an hourlong entertainment and tv news magazine slated to build up audience for each station's early evening news. Local co-hosts combine nationally produced segments with local stories and news updates throughout the program.

In publishing, Dun & Bradstreet's Reuben H. Donnelley operation recorded gains in operating revenue and income. The company decided last September to discontinue its role as a selling agent for and processor of National Yellow Pages Advertising.

This decision was based on declining commission rates over the years, resulting in insufficient profits. Donnelley held about 25% of the national Yellow Pages ad market.

Donnelley also got a new president in 1982 in Richard B. Swank. Early last year, the division began working with Vista-United Telecommunications, an independent telephone company in Lake Buena Vista to create Lake Buena Vista Florida Directory and the Visitors Information Guide, specialized directories directed at the booming central Florida market.

In July, 1982, the division rolled the second edition of Chicago Visitors Guide and Downtown Directory off the presses and left it in nearly 200,000 hotel rooms, residences and offices in the Chicago Loop.

In the Big Apple, Donnelley went to work on the first foreign language Yellow Pages, the Spanish Yellow Pages. Although revenues were up in 1982, Thomson Directories Ltd., the joint venture between Donnelley and the International Thomson Organization, has yet to show a profit. In 1982, more than 14 million copies of the Thomson directories were distributed to overseas' households and businesses.

For the second year going, Moody's Investors Service had a record year, "spurred by outstanding results from municipal bond, corporate bond and commercial paper rating activities." The volume of municipal tax-exempt financing, both long-term bonds and short-term notes, set a new record of $75 billion in 1982, while the municipal department rated over 4,000 new issues, resulting in record revenues. In an historic break from a 71-year-tradition, Moody's expanded the number of categories it assigns to issuers of corporate debt securities from nine to 19. Moody's also undertook a major review of bank-holding companies.

The company also came out with profiles of companies which have paid a rising annual dividend for at least 10 consecutive years in its Moody's Handbook of Dividend Achievers.

The airlines may be battling each other or plunging into debt, but D&B's "Official Airline Guides" continue to enjoy yet another record year.

Last year, D&B successfully tested an on-line edition of the "Official Airline Guides" and just recently rolled out an electronic edition. The company's travel magazines division had a gain in operating income, with significant gains in ad revenue and pages for its Frequent Flyer.

Technical Publishing had a soft year last year. While the operating revenue increased barely, the operating income showed a slight decline. Ad pages were down although some of the books had good showings for the year. D&B's investment in technology continued to pay off with revenue gains shown by Solid State Technology, Software News and Datamation, as well as Control Engineering and Industrial Research & Development. Last year, D&B introduced Software Search, an on-line database of available software packages.

Dun & Bradstreet's medical publications had a good revenue year with increased advertising as a result of approval by the Food & Drug Administration of new drug applications.

Among nonmedia publishing divisions, D&B's Funk & Wagnalls had a bad year in 1982. Operating revenue and income did not reach 1981 levels, which in turn were below 1980 levels. The paltry 1982 figures are a result of reduction in participation by supermarket chains in F&W's continuity series programs (i.e. "Children's Bible Stories").

In February, 1982, Dun & Bradstreet realigned its resources and operating divisions. It grouped together several of its primary data resources, seeking to facilitate greater access and sharing among the various divisions.

D&B's commercial collection, business collection, business education, plan services and Donnelley Marketing Information Service became independent divisions reporting directly to the corporate office.

James J. Crenner, John C. Holt and Volney Taylor, newly elected executive vps, now share responsibilities for the operating divisions. Reporting to Mr. Crenner, formerly chairman-president of Dun & Bradstreet Inc., a company of D&B Corp., are Reuben H. Donnelley, Moody's Investors Services and D&B commercial collection. Reporting to Mr. Holt, formerly a corporate senior vp, are Donnelley Marketing, Technical Publishing, D&B business education and Donnelley Marketing Information Service. Reporting to Mr. Taylor are Corinthian Broadcasting, Official Airline Guides, Plan Services and Salesnet, D&B's telephone marketing business. In other executive promotions James C. Rutter was named president of D&B Credit Services.

Evening News Assn.

Evening News Assn., Detroit, Mich., is the country's 35th largest media company with revenues of $257.0 million in 1982, up from $250.0 million in 1981, all from media properties. Profits fell to $4.0 million in 1982 from $5 million in 1981.

The biggest property for the ENA, the Detroit News, continues to force down profits even as it accounts for the largest portion of the company's revenues. More profitable properties in the Sunbelt and California feed the News as it battles Knight-Ridder Newspapers' Detroit Free Press in what has become the pre-eminent newspaper fight in the nation.

One casualty of the fight, News editor Bill Giles, quit this spring, catching ENA executives and the News staff by surprise. Lionel Linder moved from executive editor up to editor. (See story on opposite page.) Mr. Linder had followed Mr. Giles to the News from Dow Jones' National Observer, where they had worked together for some years.

Mr. Linder said he would follow the path set by Mr. Giles for the News. Rather than watching the day-by-day changes of the Free Press, Mr. Linder said, "I think of strategies to put us in an impregnable position."

Meanwhile, the troops keep struggling in the trenches. The News has been steadily expanding a test of morning delivery in Oakland County Detroit suburbs. That doesn't mean the News is considering giving up its afternoon home delivery, various News executives said. "It provides the customer with what he ought to have: A choice, morning or afternoon," Mr. Linder said. Most have chosen to keep afternoon delivery, he added.

When the Free Press announced plans for suburban zoned sections on Thursdays, the News came out with its own Thursday suburban sections. The Free Press switched agencies, from D'Arcy Mac Manus & Masius to W.B. Doner & Co., in November.

The News switched agencies, from N W Ayer to Yaffe Berline, in December.

The Yaffe Berline spots, with News cartoon character Motley the Cat, suggest that the only thing the Free Press is good for is wrapping fish.

Other competition failed to strike fear into the hearts of News editors. The News didn't react to the entry of USA Today in Detroit as visibly as the Free Press did, because USA Today will not cut in to the News' mostly home delivery sales.

Competition with broadcast media will be skirted, Mr. Linder said, by aiming News editorial content at areas tv and radio can't cover, including longer stories, series and lists of information.

Now that both Detroit papers have distribution and production problems out of the way, they are expected to experience a period of steady growth. Mr. Linder said the News should pass the Chicago Sun-Times on the circulation list soon. The News continues to dominate in ad linage and maintain a lead in circulation over the Free Press. The News had daily circulation (for the six months ending March 31) of 651,763, about 16,000 more than the Free Press, and Sunday circulation of 855,461, about 75,000 more than the Free Press. Circulation for both papers grew slightly from the last audit period.

Ad linage figures are more one-sided. The News grabs about a 60% share of advertising around town, thanks to dominance in Detroit area circulation. The Free Press is stronger outside the city.

Competition has also gotten hotter for the ENA's largest broadcast property, WDVM-TV, Washington. A CBS affiliate, WDVM still holds the lead in 11 p.m. news, but WRC-TV, an NBC-owned-and-operated station, is pulling into a virtual tie with the once dominant WDVM in early news.

In general, broadcast ratings and revenues remain solid, said an ENA spokesman. The company continues to look for a vhf and a uhf station to buy to bring tv holdings up to the Federal Communications Commission maximum.

There is no limit on the number of small daily and weekly papers a company can hold, and the ENA continues to steadily gobble up little papers. The latest, purchased this spring, was the Mainland Journal, a 6,500-circulation weekly, located in Pleasantville, N.J. Plans call for ENA subsidiary Times Graphics, which runs several small Eastern Seaboard newspapers, to take charge of the new paper. Since Mainland Journal coverage overlaps somewhat with the smaller weekly Egg Harbor News, also owned by ENA, their operations may be combined, said a spokesman.

The ENA is also looking to buy another midsize paper, preferably in a Sunbelt monopoly market. In recent years, the ENA's profitable Sunbelt properties have helped float losses sustained by the flagship Detroit News. Cable continues to hold some fascination for the company, the spokesman said, but not enough to make the ENA experiment there yet.

If all goes according to plan, Field will not be in the media business this time next year. In fact, it may not be in business at all.

In mid-April, the privately owned outfit announced that the two Field half-brothers, each of whom owns 50% of the company voting stock, plan to liquidate Field and distribute the assets among themselves or put them up for sale. The move was initiated by Frederick Field, who wanted to pursue his own business interests.

As a result, the Chicago Sun-Times, one of Chicago's two major daily newspapers, with revenues estimated at more than $250 million, was on the block.

Although the company said the paper had achieved "record-breaking profit levels," no visible suitors emerged. According to the liquidation plan, all assets still held at the end of one year will go into a partnership owned equally by the Field brothers.

The timing of the announcement coincided exactly with the completion of a four-year revamp of the newspaper, which included staff additions, expanded sections and ultimately a complete redesign.

For the six-month period ended March 31, Sun-Times weekday circulation dropped to 654,957 from 663,410 for the same period a year earlier, compared with archrival Chicago Tribune, whose circulation dropped 14,000 to 756,877. In Sunday circulation, the Sun-Times was down 1,000, compared with a Tribune increase of 20,000.

Even before Field went public with its corporate plan, it had begun to sell off assets. A year ago, it put its five uhf tv stations up for sale. This year the company sold WFLD-TV, Chicago, to Metromedia Inc. for $140 million, and it has announced plans to sell WLVI-TV, Boston to Gannett Co. for $47 million, and KBHK-TV, San Francisco, to United Television, Minneapolis, for $23 million, and WKBD-TV, Detroit, to Cox Communications for $70 million. Each sale is awaiting Federal Communications Commission approval. The remaining station is WKBS-TV, Philadelphia.

Although Field once had expressed interest in the cable business, a deal in which it would have acquired Eugene, Ore.-based Liberty Communications fell through in mid-1982. Through a Field Cablevision subsidiary, it still operates seven cable franchises in Southern California, serving 17,424 basic and 15,879 pay subscribers. Field is a partner with Subscription Television of America, in Super TV, a subscription tv service in Washington.

While the company had pioneered the teletext area with the formation of Field Electronic Publishing, in April of 1982 it sold the assets of that subsidiary to KEYCOM Electronic Publishing, a partnership formed by Field, Centel Corp. and Honeywell.

KEYCOM distributes KEYFAX National Teletext Magazine, a 24-hour service available to cable homes via satellite, through a joint venture with Satellite Syndicated Systems. The magazine offers indexed headlines and continuously updated news, sports, weather, business and entertainment reports.

Also in 1982, Field killed off its string of suburban shoppers.

Richard Giesen, president and chief executive officer of Field Enterprises, resigned shortly after the company announced its liquidation plans. He was succeeded by executive vp Lee Mitchell.

Freedom Newspapers

Freedom Newspapers, Santa Ana, Cal., is the country's 46th largest media company, with 1982 revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE at $207.7 million, all from media operations.

In 1981, media revenues were an estimated $194.1 million.

A privately held company, owned by descendants of the late R.C. Hoiles, Freedom Newspapers is a print-oriented media company, although it recently has acquired two tv stations.

But the flagship remains the Santa Ana Register in Orange County, the affluent suburban area south of Los Angeles. Freedom also publishes two lesser dailies in this area: Anaheim Bulletin and La Habra-Brea Star Progress.

The Register has been riding the wave of Orange County's explosive growth as its daily circulation rose from 172,000 in 1971 to 253,388 in 1982, according to Audit Bureau of Circulations. Times-Mirror Co.'s Los Angeles Times, Southern California's largest daily with nearly 1.1 million circulation, had about 90,000 less circulation in Orange County in 1982. Also, the Register is fifth nationally in advertising linage among newspapers, according to Media Records.

To provide advertisers with total market coverage, Freedom Newspapers launched Orange County Week in January, 1983, as a weekly containing repackaged Register stories, and mailed to about 800,000 non-Register homes in Orange County. In April, 1983, Freedom also began offering Community Week as a zoned insert within the Register as a bid to maintain the local news franchise that has eroded because of the newspaper's rapid growth.

The Register embarked on an upgrading campaign in recent years that improved its editorial product, reducing the conservative slant in its news pages. The past politicization was attributable to founder Mr. Hoiles' ardent libertarian views.

Mr. Hoiles' heirs are in a dispute over Freedom Newspapers that resulted in a civil suit filed by Harry H. Hoiles, one of three children of the founder.

Harry Hoiles, alleging that others in the family have tried to exclude him from company affairs, wants a California state court to order that Freedom Newspapers be divided up among its owners. The suit is pending and a spokeswoman said it has not affected day-to-day operations.

In other legal matters, Freedom Newspapers is being sued for more than $30 million by a Los Angeles area businessman, who said the Register libeled him in stories by linking him to organized crime.

Freedom Newspapers owns 30 newspapers of which the Colorado Springs Gazette-Telegraph, with 88,000 circulation, is next largest after the Register. Some of its newspapers have local partners holding minor interests but in all cases Freedom Newspapers is majority owner.

As part of a recent diversification into tv, Freedom purchased WLNE, New Bedford, Mass., the CBS affiliate in the Providence, R.I./New Bedford, Mass., tv market from Pulitzer Publishing Co. in 1983. The company had bought a Medford, Ore., tv station a year earlier.

In other recent developments, Freedom Newspapers sold two smaller New York state dailies and purchased a weekly shopper publisher, Community Press Newspapers, in Denver.

Gannett Co.

Gannett Co., Rochester, N.Y., is the fifth largest U.S. media company, with media revenues of $1.49 billion in 1982, or 98% of total revenues of $1.52 billion. Newspapers accounted for 76.1% of the total revenue; outdoor advertising, 11.5%, and broadcasting, 10.6%, approximately the same percentages as in 1981.

Media revenues were up 11% from $1.35 billion in 1981. Total earnings increased 5% to $180.5 million from $172.5 million. It was the smallest year-to-year percentage growth in earnings in recent years.

Growth also was slow for the first quarter of this year, with earnings at $32.2 million, a 2% increase over the first quarter of 1982. It was the smallest quarterly earnings rise in the 62 quarters since Gannett became a publicly held company in 1957.

But in a letter to shareholders, Gannett chairman and president Allen Neuharth said first-quarter earnings "exceeded our expectations, in view of the substantial startup costs of Gannett's new national newspaper, USA Today."

According to the company, net income growth from 1981 to 1982 would have "approximated the company's recent historic growth rate," without start-up costs for USA Today. (Gannett's percentage earnings increases have been in double figures each year since at least the early 1970s.)

The launching of USA Today was, of course, the biggest event of Gannett's year, and may well have been the most highly publicized, closely watched newspaper startup in American history. Beginning with a September roll-out in the Washington-Baltimore area, the color-laden, digest-style broadsheet is now in 15 major markets—the most recent being New York, where distribution began in April.

This fall, USA Today will be available in four new markets: Cleveland, Dallas/Ft. Worth, Boston and New Orleans.

A Price Waterhouse circulation report issued soon after the New York introduction says USA Today sales have reached 1.1 million copies daily, making it the country's third-biggest weekday paper, behind the Wall Street Journal and the New York Daily News.

(The company's projections last September called for USA Today to reach 800,000 by this April and 1.15 million by the end of 1983, with a long-range goal of 2.35 million by 1987.)

The Audit Bureau of Circulations will begin auditing the paper's circulation in late 1983, after the paper has completed one year of publication.

Reaction to the paper from the media community has varied widely, with critics assailing the once-over-lightly approach fostered by the brevity of the articles and what they perceive as a stress on appearance over content.

Supporters of USA Today praise its skillful use of color, its tight editing, its maps and charts and its sports section. (One indication of the paper's impact is that in many markets where it has begun circulating, local dailies have immediately stepped up their own use of color, bold graphics and digest columns.)

In April, USA Today editor John J. Curley was named president of Gannett's newspaper division, replacing John Heseldon, who was named to the new post of deputy chairman.

Replacing Mr. Curley as USA Today editor is John C. Quinn, a senior vp who also retains his title as "chief news executive" at Gannett. Louis A. Weil III was promoted to senior vp-planning and is in charge of Gannett's "Project S" task force, which Mr. Neuharth says is exploring new ways to market the company's news and information.

A spokesman for the company says it is pleased with the advertising progress of USA Today. At an April meeting of analysts, Mr. Neuharth reported that the paper averaged 8.3 pages of advertising daily during April, while the projections for the second quarter of 1983 had called for an average of seven pages per issue.

Elsewhere at Gannett in 1982, three daily newspapers were acquired—the Jackson (Miss.) Clarion-Ledger and Daily News and the Hattiesburg (Miss.) American—and the company also bought six Mississippi weeklies. Westchester County Today, a suburban New York daily, ceased publication, Eastbay Today in California was merged into the Oakland Tribune, which the company sold this year. (See story on Page M-46.)

The Little Falls (Minn.) Daily Transcript was combined with the neighboring St. Cloud Daily Times.

In April of this year, the company acquired WTCN-TV in Minneapolis-St. Paul from Metromedia Inc., concurrently selling KARK-TV in Little Rock, Ark., to maintain the legal limit of seven stations.

In the newspaper division in 1982, advertising linage decreased 2%; local and national linage both were down 7%, while classified linage fell by 9%. Preprint linage, however, increased 14%. Daily circulation decreased 1%, while the company said Sunday circulation increased "slightly."

Despite this, both advertising and circulation revenues increased (8.6% and 15.7% respectively) because of increases in advertising and circulation rates and the acquisition of the Mississippi dailies.

IN MIAMI ONE TV STATION REACHES HALF THE MARKET.

IT TAKES 5 STATIONS TO REACH THE OTHER HALF.

SIMPLE MATHEMATICS.

A lot of media buyers make the mistake of thinking that Spanish television stations reach minority households without much buying power.

Well if you make that mistake in the Metro-Miami market, get ready to say adios to a lot of your clients.

Because in the Miami-Metro market, the Spanish audience means big numbers in the ratings race. And even bigger numbers in terms of buying power.

Consider: Miami's Latin market comprises one half of Metro-Miami's population. And one half of Metro-Miami's $6 billion market. The median Latin household income is a whopping $22.000 plus per year. Which buys a lot of Whoppers, Big Macs, Cervezas, soap and so on.

And in this market, the Latin television market audience does its shopping on Channel 23.

Consider: Channel 23 is now the Number One ranked television station in prime access time in the Miami-Metro area.*

Channel 23 is also the Number Two ranked station in the Miami-Metro area during fringe and prime time combined.

And the Number One ranked independent television station in America's top 20 markets in attracting women aged 25 to 54.

It does its shopping in Spanish, on television, on Channel 23, the TV channel Miami's Latins watch more and believe in more than any other TV channel in South Florida.

Which means if you're not including Channel 23 in your overall Miami media buy, you're not talking directly to a $6 billion market.

In plain English, you can't make it in Miami without speaking Spanish. On Channel 23.

Bucking a national trend

By Gary Levin

Robert Clyve Maynard is one happy newspaperman. At 46, he is the first black to own, edit and publish a major metropolitan daily, the Oakland (Cal.) Tribune. "I'm elated," he said in an interview shortly after he purchased the 109-year-old paper in April (AA, May 2).

But Mr. Maynard is annoyed, too, at the amount of media coverage heaped upon him because of his skin color. "I hope that after 200 years, it shouldn't come as a surprise that a black is the owner of a major American newspaper," he says.

The bigger surprise, he says, is that he bought the Tribune from the mighty Gannett Co., bucking a national trend.

Prompted in part by Gannett's intense desire to buy San Francisco's KRON-TV, and the Federal Communications Commission's position against media crossownership in the same market, the Tribune had been on the auction block since October.

Like many other dailies, the paper has lost some ad revenues, concentrated mostly in the classified department, Mr. Maynard says. But it has posted some gains in the last few years as well: Ad linage has increased in the airline, tobacco and retail categories.

Other improvements have been made since Gannett bought the Tribune in 1979 and named Mr. Maynard its editor. More wire services, better sports and business coverage have been added, but Mr. Maynard, who also became publisher in 1981, has grander visions for the now privately owned paper. "Everything can be improved upon, including this newswpaper," he says.

Mr. Maynard says readers will probably see more "fine-tuning" than any major changes in the Tribune. He'd like to improve the paper's graphics, no doubt to keep up with Gannett's own USA Today.

And he'd like to expand its suburban penetration, a key step in retaining the Tribune's already faltering 166,700 circulation. (The Tribune was combined with East Bay Today in October. Audit Bureau of Circulations figures for EBT in September were 69,776, down from 81,772.)

Maynard: Fine-tuning Oakland's coverage.

One reason for the recent drop-off in figures is the uncertainty surrounding the fate of the newspaper after Gannett announced it would sell the Tribune.

No less a factor was the simultaneous change from a p.m. to an a.m. cycle and the consolidation of a home-delivered afternoon edition, the Oakland Tribune, with an earlier, street sale version, East Bay Today.

Ever the optimist, Mr. Maynard says any readership losses will be short term. The "excellent reaction" of the Oakland community to the change of ownership has put the paper back on solid ground, and though it lost $3 million last year, Mr. Maynard expects to break even in 1983.

"There's a general sense of confidence when our future is assured," he says. (Some speculate that Gannett might have closed the paper if a buyer wasn't found.)

If the Tribune's destiny is certain, then so is that of its new owner. The former high-school dropout, who began his journalism career at several ethnic newspapers, including the Afro-American News in Baltimore, worked for six years as a reporter for the York (Pa.) Gazette and Daily before becoming a Nieman fellow in journalism at Harvard in 1966.

Mr. Maynard then was hired as a reporter by the Washington Post in 1967, where he subsequently moved up the ranks as an associate editor, ombudsman and editorial writer. He joined the Tribune in 1979 after spending two years at the University of California at Berkeley in charge of a teaching institute for minority journalists.

Although he says he's not convinced that minorities have gotten a fair shake among newspaper staffs, "I'm sure [the situation] will improve soon."

And it may. Mr. Maynard plans to increase his editorial and advertising staff to facilitate broader coverage of the Bay Area market, but not necessarily with minorities. His current employes have been appreciative of Mr. Maynard's efforts to negotiate the $22 million purchase of the Tribune: The paper's unions ratified the agreement by a 9-to-1 margin.

A co-worker describes Mr. Maynard as a boss who's easy-going and even-tempered, but at the same time demanding and very committed to his work.

"He's very approachable," she says. "He wanders through the newsroom all the time, and doesn't just sit behind a desk in his office."

His dedication to Tribune employes is perhaps best exemplified by the way he announced his purchase of the paper. Before any of the media were contacted, Mr. Maynard called the entire staff to an early cocktail reception, where several members of the board of directors mingled with reporters and salespeople.

That decidedly uncorporate-like spirit seems to have worked at the Tribune. Mr. Maynard paints nothing but the best picture for the paper's future, and he thinks his pioneering effort at breaking away from the chains can work at other papers, too.

"Now that we've proved that it can be done, our solution may apply elsewhere." ■

General Electric Co.

General Electric Co., Fairfield, Conn., is the country's 53rd largest media company, with 1982 revenues from media property estimated by ADVERTISING AGE at $175.0 million, or 0.6% of total company revenues of $26.5 billion.

The revenues from media properties remained unchanged in 1982, according to Sal Belanger, vp-general manager for General Electric Cablevision. However, over-all revenues for the company declined by 3% from $27.2 billion in 1981. Net earnings increased 10%, from $1.65 billion in 1981 to $1.81 billion in 1982.

In its annual report to shareholders, GE noted that tv sales were flat and, despite higher unit volume, operations resulted in a loss because of highly competitive conditions and depressed pricing. However, broadcasting and cable tv revenues more than offset the deficit and showed continued growth.

At the end of the year, GE announced that it was breaking up a partnership with Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. of Japan, Victor Co. of Japan and Thorn EMI Ltd. of the U.K.—a partnership established to develop the video high density (vhd) system, the third of the videodisc systems expected to enter the market. The four partners agreed that the uncertain economic and market environment made it necessary to put off the project and dismantle the vhd program distribution and production company in Hollywood and the vhd disc maker's facility in Irvine, Cal.

GE operates two consolidated media affiliates within its consumer products and services group: General Electric Broadcasting Co., which in 1982 operated three tv stations and eight radio stations, and General Electric Cablevision. The cable tv unit had 314,000 basic subscribers and 200,000 pay subscribers at the end of 1982. The number of basic subscribers increased 18,000 or 6% from the May total of 296,227.

Even though GE is going strong in cable tv, it is pulling out of the areas it helped pioneer. In November, 1982, it announced that it planned to put all of its radio stations and two of three tv stations up for sale. GE, which helped launch radio with WGY (am) in Schenectady, N.Y., in 1922, will keep only KOA-TV in Denver. The company refused to discuss the reasons for its decision.

In 1979, GE had originally planned to spin off its broadcast properties as part of its proposed acquisition of Atlanta's Cox Broadcasting, but the transaction fell through. Then, the properties had been valued at close to $70 million. This time around the properties are estimated to be between $90 million and $100 million.

Meanwhile, GE continues its innovations in cable tv. Last year, along with Cox Cable in San Diego and Storer Cable in New Haven, General Electric Cablevision's Grand Rapids, Mich., system participated in testing programs from Germany. The three systems cablecast four three-hour programs, consisting of selected films and documentaries from the two German public tv networks.

The German program test could help establish a Telefrance-like channel for Germany in this country. GE is deeply involved in some of the technological aspects of cable as well. At the end of last year, General Electric unveiled its Comband system at the Western Cable Show.

The new system, which enables cable operators to double the number of cable channels made available to subscribers, is expected to have a dramatic impact on cablecasting. Comband is based on an analog band width suppression system that compresses two picture sources into the space traditionally occupied by one. At the subscriber's end, the technology once again separates and reconstructs the channel as two separate channels.

GE, rich in cash following the sale of its Utah International subsidiary in March for $2.4 billion—adding to the $2.5 billion the company had at the end of 1982—is no doubt looking for areas of investment. And cable is being viewed by industry sources as one of the likely beneficiaries.

General Tire & Rubber

General Tire & Rubber Co., Akron, O., through its wholly owned subsidiary RKO General, is the country's 30th largest media company.

Media revenues from New York-based RKO for fiscal 1982 were $288.2 million, or 12% of total revenues of $2.47 billion. In 1981, media revenues were $160.9 million, or about 7% of total revenues of $2.18 billion.

While revenues remain strong, RKO has faced a number of large hurdles, some of which were not overcome.

Last April, the U.S. Supreme Court refused the company's request that it review a Federal Communications Commission decision, which found improprieties during hearings over renewal of its license for WNAC-TV, Boston.

The high court's refusal disqualified the company from retaining that license.

On May 22, 1982, the former RKO station went on the air for the first time as CBS affiliate WNEV. RKO got $22 million from the forced sale.

RKO also has been in jeopardy of losing WOR-TV in New York and KHJ-TV in Los Angeles, because of allegations of misconduct by RKO's parent.

Last August, following congressional adoption of an amendment backed by Sen. Bill Bradley (D.-N.J.), RKO began considering plans to move WOR-TV from New York to New Jersey.

The move would serve as a "safe harbor" for RKO, because the rider required the FCC to renew RKO's operating license for up to five years. However, RKO is holding off relocating the station until all litigation is concluded.

Earlier this month, the FCC voted 4 to 0 to reopen the inquiry into General Tire's conduct, and to consider the application of competing Fidelity Television for the Los Angeles tv license.

Last November, RKO took about a $10 million after-tax charge in its fiscal fourth quarter. The charge was a write-down of RKO's investment in a joint movie venture with Universal City Studios.

The three-year joint venture program, which began in 1980, requires that RKO contribute $25 million annually, and that Universal City Studios contribute $8.3 million for the same period.

The payoff to RKO was to be 75% of the joint venture's revenues—after expenses and distribution fees—as well as additional payments.

The write-down was said to be the result of box office failures on a number of the films.

In the midst of its problems, RKO has forged new ground.

Last August, RKO Radio Networks, New York, announced that it would begin offering advertisers a service called CAMERA (Commercial & Management Evaluation Report). CAMERA would enable RKO clients to know not only that a commercial has aired on one of its networks but how it cleared (live, delayed, within or outside a show).

Unlike other networks' clearance services, RKO at the time said that CAMERA is a 52-weeks-a-year analysis.

Market-by-market data are available for weekly reviews, with final audited reports ready within 60 days of the end of each month.

And last August, RKO Radio Networks said that it would pick up the cost for the installation of three-meter earth stations for RKO I and RKO II affiliates in the top 150 markets, an undertaking valued at $15 million-plus.

Using transponder space on RCA's Satcom I, the Audio Digital Distribution System will give the network six audio channels. Scientific Atlanta was hired to build and install the dishes.

Also, early last year, RKO became a charter member of the Radio Network Assn. In addition to RKO, other charter members include ABC, CBS, NBC and United Stations.

The aim of the association is to promote better understanding of network radio among advertising agencies and advertisers.

In addition to its broadcast properties, RKO also owns a soft

BUY SOME INEXPENSIVE INSURANCE HERE.

Did you know there's an easy, inexpensive way to make every TV buy you make, better?

Just a small percentage of your TV budget spent in Outdoor can act like a media insurance policy to protect your advertising investment. And these days every TV advertiser needs insurance.

Consider some of the risks: If you need to build frequency quickly and effectively, can you afford to do it solely with TV? Will your commercial break through the clutter? Will target audiences, like working women, see your message on TV?

Unlike any other media, Outdoor complements TV because it doesn't compete with TV. It's seen away from the clutter and confusion of competing indoor media—TV, newspapers, and magazines.

In fact, Outdoor in combination with TV takes advantage of the best both media have to offer. As a high frequency medium, Outdoor makes the most of TV's reach. It can insure that the more affluent, mobile, working men and women will see your message, even if they're not watching TV. And just like TV's "road-blocking," Outdoor makes sure your TV message is unavoidable.

To find out how Outdoor can improve every TV buy you make, call the Institute of Outdoor Advertising at (212) 986-5920. Or write: IOA, 342 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10173.

H&C Communications

H&C Communications, a privately held company owned by the Hobby family of Houston, is the 44th largest media company in the nation, with revenues estimated by Advertising Age at $210.8 million, an increase of 11.9% from 1981's estimated $188.3 million.

All revenues are from media properties, the largest being the Houston Post, which accounted for about 80% of the company's revenues. The remaining are from its broadcast holdings.

H&C Communication will not discuss its operations. In a 1978 Texas Monthly article, the company's net worth was estimated at $200 million.

But Oveta Culp Hobby, chairman and editor, reportedly characterized that estimate to be a little high.

The Hobby family has owned the company since 1939. And despite rumors to the contrary, Harry Hayes, vp-sales and marketing, says that Mrs. Hobby, now 77, remains as involved in the newspaper as ever: "She still runs the paper. You bet she does."

Both the Post and the Houston Chronicle remain tight-lipped about the heated newspaper competition in Houston, which this year has been compounded by the presence of USA Today. Though Mr. Hayes said USA Today has had no effect on the Post, he also said the Post has, since the arrival of USA Today, begun using larger pictures and more color in the newspaper. The Chronicle is doing the same.

Other changes the Post made last year include introduction of a new travel section and a new arts and entertainment section in its Sunday edition, as well as an expanded focus for its Tuesday business section on financial news, headlining the business section, Investment Tuesday.

Also in mid-May the Post began a classified ad promotion, which supports its on-going "The Post puts the good in every morning," ad campaign launched last year.

H&C Communication has made no major staff changes in the last year and has not made any media acquisitions or sales.

Harcourt Brace Jovanovich

Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, New York, is the country's 71st largest media company, with media revenues estimated by Advertising Age of $122.4 in 1982, or 21% of total revenues of $575.3 million.

In 1981, media revenues were $107.0 million, or 20% of total revenues of $539.3 million.

The publicly held company's media properties are in its HBJ Communications & Services unit (magazines, tv, insurance, book clubs and management consulting).

The company has two other operating units: HBJ Publishers (books, academic journals and instruction courses) and Sea World Enterprises (marine parks, food processing and services and land development).

Last March, HBJ posted a fourth-quarter net loss of $15.9 million, which it partly attributed to a $27.7 million charge for relocating some of its operations, including book publishing, to San Diego and reorganizing operations.

The corporate office will move from New York to Orlando, Fla., in February, 1984.

For 1982, net income, including the extraordinary charge, fell about 86% to $3.3 million from $23.8 million a year earlier as revenues rose approximately 6.7%.

Citing lower sales and higher development costs in its textbook business, the company posted an operating loss of $4.3 million in the 1982 quarter, contrasted with operating profits of $3.4 million for the same period in 1981.

The company's publishing division suffered a fourth-quarter loss of $2.4 million in the 1982 quarter, against earnings of $5.8 million in 1981. Sea World Enterprises' loss grew to $1.7 million from $1.5 million, mirroring recessionary seasonal attendance declines at the marine and land-development unit. On a more positive note, however, earnings of HBJ Communications & Services more than doubled to $2.1 million from $960,000.

Despite recent history, J. Kendrick Noble, an analyst with Paine Webber in New York, foresees HBJ's earnings pendulum swinging pleasantly over the next few years.

"By 1985, their earnings picture should look much brighter," he said.

For one thing, Mr. Noble and others say the decade holds promise for HBJ's principal publishing businesses, notably educational books. "That market looks particularly good," he noted. "Stocks in school books and college textbooks have been outperforming the field, and 1985 should be the best year since 1968." In saying so, he cites the baby boom generation giving birth to a new influx of school children.

Over the past year, the big news at HBJ has been in real estate, not publishing. In February, 1981, the company announced it would, over the course of the next several years, move corporate and certain divisional headquarters out of New York to San Diego and Orlando, Fla.

Several observers have questioned the wisdom of this decision; they particularly worry that top publishing talent will be tougher to come by in the Sunbelt. For his part, Mr. Noble remained "neutral" about HBJ's decision, preferring to adopt a "wait and see" attitide.

In the 1982 annual report, HBJ chairman William Jovanovich—often described as volatile and brilliant—explained that relocating should save HBJ more than $25 million annually in terms of staff reductions, savings on rent and by faster, more accurate data handling. In saying so, he cited the college department, which moved to San Diego a year ago, and showed a 1982 operating profits increase of 24% on only "slight" upturn in revenues.

Mr. Jovanovich added that over the last year and a half, the company had installed a new chief executive or chief operating officer in 10 operating units. They include the college department, the London headquarters, the Toronto headquarters, Grune & Stratton, Harvest Publishing, Weber Costello and HBJ Insurance.

Other items spurred talk in 1982. Last fall, rumors surfaced that HBJ was for sale, with Gannett Co. its prime suitor. At the time, Mr. Jovanovich adamantly denied any such notion, and the rumors have since died down.

In 1982, the company introduced a newsletter entitled, "Executive Edge," covering such subjects as relocation, contracts, mergers, serverance pay and overseas assignments.

Harte-Hanks Communications

Harte-Hanks Communications, San Antonio, is the 24th largest media company, with media property revenues of $333.8 million in 1982, or 84% of total revenues of $396.9 million. Media revenues rose 11% from $300.9 million in 1981, or 86% of total revenues, while total revenues were up 14% from $348.5 million.

The publicly owned company reported that 50% of its revenues in 1982 came from newspapers and commercial printing. Consumer direct marketing accounted for 28%, while radio, tv and cable contributed 20.6% of the total.

Total earning last year rose 8% to $27.3 million from $25.4 million.

Harte-Hanks owns and operates 28 daily newspapers; 75 nondaily publications, including weekly newspapers; advertising publications produced by newspapers, and a trade publication for the radio industry. The company also publishes shoppers that are zoned into more than 300 separate editions, reaching 3.2 million households weekly, owns four vhf network affiliated tv stations, five am and six fm radio stations and a division that develops entertainment programs and products. The company also owns or manages nine cable systems, owns and operates six marketing services companies, 18 direct mail systems—with direct mail programs reaching 96% of American households—and has seven alternate delivery systems, which can reach 2 million households via hand delivery.

In a letter to stockholders in the HHC 1982 annual report Robert G. Marbut, president and chief executive officer, said, "Over-all strategy for 1982 was one of restraint," with yearend emphasis on basic operations including improving productivity, generating revenues, controlling expenses and managing assets and people more prudently.

Results of that strategy are most noted in HHC's hottest area of development, Consumer Distribution Marketing (CDM). CDM is HHC's vehicle for offering advertisers total market coverage through a variety of advertising alternatives branching off from its shopper publications. For CDM, 1982 was a year of realignment.

Charles H. Everill was named CDM president, moving from senior vp of marketing, head of cable operations, a newspaper publisher and a newspaper group president. He succeeded C. Ben Rogers, who left the company.

Last year CDM was geographically realigned into three new operating groups: CDM East, CDM West and CDM South, plus a Marketing Services group offering research, telephone marketing and computer services. Also, several operations in California were consolidated to create new Southern California and northern California divisions.

New mail services introduced at CDM this year include mail order merchandising, direct mail couponing and single sheet inserts, expansion of its marriage mail service and hand delivery service. CDM also launched a trucking service in several markets as an added service for commercial printing and direct mail customers.

And CDM's research company, RMH Research, began last year serving as research coordinator in a two-year electronic publishing test conducted by Associated Press and CompuServe.

Other HHC changes during 1982 included 13 HHC newspaper in Texas developing computerized subscriber/nonsubscriber lists for their markets to be used as a database for distributing advertising material on either a total market penetration basis or on a selective basis, targeting Zip codes.

In radio, HHC introduced am stereo last year into its radio stations in Birmingham, Ala., Houston and Phoenix, Ariz., a first in all three markets.

Radio formats of the Tampa/St. Petersburg, Fla., am station and of the Houston am and fm stations were shifted.

And HHC radio stations in Memphis, Tenn.; Portland, Ore., and Birmingham were put up for sale. To date only WEZI-FM, Memphis, has been sold, to Firstcom Corp., Little Rock, for $3.4 million.

HHC's cable efforts are currently focused on promoting its recently rebuilt Pasadena system.

NO WEAK DAYS

In Colorado, more people read the Rocky Mountain News than any other paper—Every day—7 days a week.

The latest ABC Audit Report (Sept. 1982) confirms what advertisers already know—the Rocky Mountain News leads the Denver Post in both daily and Sunday circulation throughout Colorado. When you compare ad costs with circulation numbers, only one newspaper is strong every day of the week.

The pendulum swings against the press

By Gary Levin

Times are getting tougher for libel lawyers and their clients. Not only are more people suing newspapers, magazines and broadcast outlets—they're winning, too.

Media defendants have lost nine out of every 10 recent cases tried before a jury, and awards for damages are escalating at an alarming rate.

But all is not gloomy in the journalism trade, however. A study of recent libel suits by the Libel Defense Resource Center (LDRC), a media-supported research group, says damage awards were reduced or reversed in four of every five cases appealed.

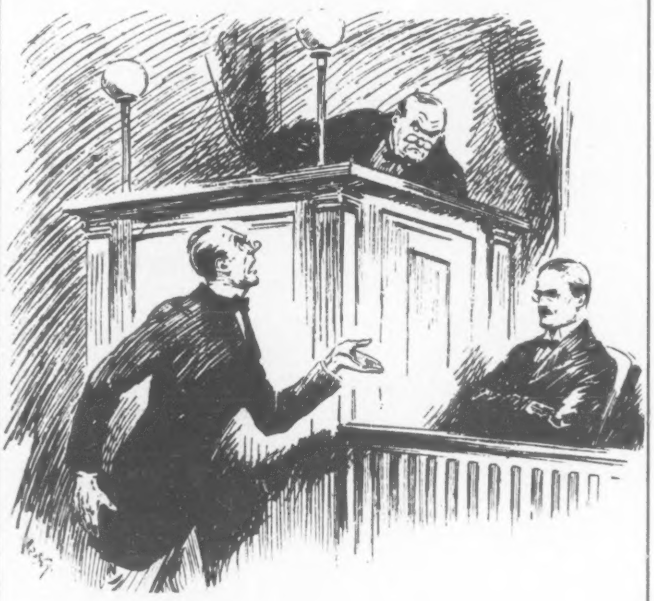
Yet that finding comes as small comfort to libel attorneys and media companies, who find themselves warding off potential and actual lawsuits with ever-increasing frequency.

After a tide of pro-First Amendment sentiment following the celebrated Pentagon Papers and New York Times v. Sullivan cases, why the upswing in successful libel actions? Some lawyers attribute the turnaround to an anger felt by the general population toward guardians of the public trust.

Dan Feldman, who represents Chicago-based Field Enterprises for Isham, Lincoln & Beale, says it's an aspect of consumerism: "The population at large distrusts newspapers because they're institutions: it happens in every recession." Adds attorney Don Reuben, of Reuben & Procter (which represents Tribune Co.) : "Very few organizations generate such emotion as the media—they're lightning rods."

The huge awards levied against the media, and the publicity that surrounds them, inspires further lawsuits by persons who believe they've been defamed. Defense lawyers, meanwhile, can no longer ignore potential suits against them as unwinnable.

"You have to regard these cases as more serious than you did," says Mr. Feldman. "In the past, they were usually dismissed on a point of law without a trial. Now, you have to raise the level at which you defend clients, because you can't count on a sympathetic jury."



That more cases are being decided by juries that are increasingly unsympathetic is disquieting for journalists and their lawyers. The recent case against the Washington Post brought by Mobil Corp. president William Tavoulareas, which ended in a $2.1 million settlement against the Post, is a good example. That decision was later overturned.

The jury in the Post case virtually ignored the instructions given to it by the judge, experts say. It decided the case on the basis of the Post's reporting methods rather than on the "actual malice" standard required by Mr. Tavoulareas' "public figure" status.

"There's a concern that juries may not understand or be willing to apply the applicable law as they're instructed by the court," says David Sanders of Chicago-based Jenner & Block (which represents ADVERTISING AGE and other Crain Communications publications).

That fear, coupled with the fog shrouding the issue of public vs. private figure status, has made it virtually impossible to gauge the reaction of juries, and in some cases, judges as well. The result is an often confrontational setting in the courtroom that pits the media defendant against the discovery process of the court itself.

As publishers and broadcasters rely more upon special privilege claims, including protection of sources, and demand access to sealed court records, judges will be more apt to rule against them.

A case in point is the still-pending suit against CBS News by former Army Gen. William C. Westmoreland for CBS's "Vietnam Deception" documentary, after it already had made portions of the report available to the public.

"The media are going to have trouble as long as they take on the judicial system, which is the cause of their troubles," says Mr. Reuben. "The court looks at it differently when the media says to it, 'I'm going to defy your order.' "

One remedy for the legal entanglements prompted by the burgeoning caseloads is the summary judgment proceeding, which dismisses a suit before trial or on appeal if an evidentiary standard cannot be met. The summary judgment has been "the rule rather than the exception," says the LRDC's general counsel, Henry Kaufman, who reports that the motions filed by media defendants have been successful in three out of every four cases filed in the last few years.

When the tough standard of "actual malice" is applied in public figure cases, eight out of 10 motions for summary judgments are granted.

Still, the threat of legal action is enough to keep journalists on their toes and to ensure that their attorneys stay busy and wealthy.

"It'll get worse before it gets better," says Mr. Reuben of the recent trend in media law. "The pendulum is going against the press, and newspapers ought to remember that they're going to be treated like every other citizen.

"There are no special privileges anymore; they've just got to have a fetish for accuracy."

Hearst Corp.

Hearst Corp., New York, is the ninth largest U. S. media company, with 1982 media property revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE at $1.30 billion. Total revenues of the closely-held company were not available. In 1981, its media revenues were estimated at $1.20 billion.

Hearst, founded by newspaper magnate William Randolph Hearst Sr., bills itself as the foremost monthly magazine publisher in the nation and is expanding on all media fronts. Tv holdings were enlarged with two tv station acquisitions in the past two years.

Hearst made a major entry into cable tv programing (in a joint venture with American Broadcasting Cos.) two years ago. It bought several small cable systems in early 1983, for the first time becoming a cable system operator. A trouble spot is the newspaper division, which operates unprofitable dailies in several major markets, although its money-losing Boston property was sold in 1982.

In magazine operations, Hearst's most significant move has been purchasing Redbook and Charter Data Services, the Des Moines, Ia.-based subscription fulfillment company. Both were acquired from Charter Co. in spring, 1982, for $23 million in cash and promissory notes.

Upon taking the reins of Redbook, Hearst replaced its top brass and repositioned the magazine. The prime demographic target is now women aged 25 to 44, rather than young mothers 18 to 34. The new target group puts Redbook between Hearst's younger-skewing Cosmopolitan and older-appeal Good Housekeeping.

The United Technical Publications division launched Integrated Circuits in November, 1982, an electronics magazine with six times annual frequency that is expected to be a monthly in 1984. Bound into it will be several directory publications that Hearst already offers in the same field.

Among its major consumer magazines are Sports Afield, Harper's Bazaar and Popular Mechanics. Besides acquisitions such as the Redbook purchase, Hearst is developing new properties. A men's fashion magazine, Men's Bazaar, is one possibility that has been shelved for the time being. Country Living and Colonial Homes are successful startups launched in recent years.

Among significant executive shifts in magazine operations, Thomas Losee, assistant to the magazine division general manager, was promoted to Science Digest publisher in July. He replaced Charles Mandel, who left the company.

The company created Hearst Broadcasting Productions in January, 1983, stepping up its tv syndication activities. Hearst hopes tv syndication operations will synergistically mesh with its tv station holdings, which were expanded with the addition of WDTN-TV, Dayton, O., in 1981 and KMBC-TV, Kansas City, in 1982. With those tv stations, Hearst operates five vhf tv stations, the most permitted by the Federal Communications Commission.

More recently, Hearst has been on the march in cable tv. Daytime, the advertiser-supported basic cable tv network geared to women, expanded from a four-hour long, Monday-through-Friday afternoon schedule to eight hours seven-days-a-week. Further schedule expansion is planned.The women-oriented network is a joint venture with ABC Inc. through Hearst/ABC Video Services, formed in June, 1981. In January, 1983, the joint venture assumed operation of the ad-supported cultural cable tv service, ARTS, which ABC had started.

Both basic cable networks operate in the red, as do most other ad-supported cable tv networks, which generally had a lackluster year in 1982.

But in April, 1983, Hearst purchased three cable tv systems, with an aggregate total of 20,000 subscribers in the San Francisco Bay Area cities of Milpitas, Los Gatos and Santa Clara. The acquisition from Group W Cable marked Hearst's entry into cable tv system operations. Newspaper operations made a major divestiture, selling for $1 million Hearst's money-losing Boston Herald American. Rupert Murdoch was the buyer, taking over in December, 1982, and changing its name to the Boston Herald.

Several other Hearst big city newspapers are also ailing.

Losses at the Los Angeles Herald Examiner are believed to run into the millions annually. The Herald Examiner, with a 265,401 daily circulation as of March, 1983, has been in decline for more than a decade, although it is still the market's second-leading newspaper after the 1.1 million circulation Los Angeles Times.

To bolster it, Hearst purchased 28 Southern California weeklies and two small dailies in 1981, whose pages are offered to Herald Examiner advertisers in a special group buy. In 1982, the Herald Examiner made the transition from a p.m. to an a.m. newspaper.

"I am not discouraged by what has been happening" with the recent Herald Examiner changes, said Robert Danzig, vp-general manager of Hearst's newspaper division.

Hearst's Seattle Post-Intelligencer is combining printing and ad sales with competitor Seattle Times, under a joint operating agreement. Post-Intelligencer losses for the first seven months of 1982 were put at $4 million. The Blethen family and Knight-Ridder Newspapers operate the Seattle Times.

"What's often overlooked is that we have splendid newspaper properties" elsewhere, such as San Francisco, Albany, N.Y., and San Antonio, said Mr. Danzig.

In June, 1982, Hearst sold its 5% interest in money-losing United Press International to a privately held company.

Hearst is a major book publisher although these operations are not counted among media properties. Also not included among media properties is the Hearst-operated King Features Syndicate, which distributes popular newspaper comics strips such as "Popeye" and "Blondie."

Houston Chronicle Publishing Co.

Houston Chronicle Publishing Co., Houston, is the 54th largest media company in the nation, with 1982 revenues estimated by Advertising Age at $167.9 million, all from its sole business, the Houston Chronicle. For the fifth straight year the Chronicle remains the nation's leader in classified ad linage, and for the second consecutive year the all-day newspaper holds the No. 2 slot in total advertising linage in the nation, second only to the Los Angeles Times.

The Chronicle is part of the Houston Endowment, a private charitable foundation created upon the death of Houston businessman Jesse H. Jones in 1956. Mr. Jones left the newspaper, several banks, corporations and various other properties to the endowment.

A federal tax statute, the Tax Reform Act of 1969, requires that by mid-1989 the endowment own no more than 50% interest in the Chronicle, but to date there have been no reports of negotiations for sale of the newspaper. Two years ago, industry analysts said the newspaper could be sold for $200 million to $400 million.

Sen. Lloyd Bentsen of Texas has made repeated congressional attempts to exempt the Chronicle from the tax code. During his successful reelection campaign last year he vowed to continue offering exemption solutions until one passes.

In January, the Chronicle and the Financial Times of London began publishing a weekly, multipage section of international business within the Chronicle's business section, the first such venture by the Times in North America. Chronicle marketing director Robert Holt said the section is a "great success."

Also in January, the Chronicle launched its first cable venture, "Business Edition," a regional business program co-produced by QUBE cable Houston, Warner Amex Cable Communications and the Chronicle which aired both in Dallas and Houston, via QUBE cable.

"Business Edition" presented news, features, profiles and interviews with business leaders with audience interaction, via QUBE cable. The Chronicle's business writers presented stories on camera and provided editorial research for the program.

At the end of the program's initial 15-week contract, the Chronicle opted not to renew "Business Edition," saying the program would be evaluated. Initial program response was positive but indicated that Houston demanded a program featuring more city rather than regional concentration, according to Page Haines, manager of planning/special projects.

Both the Chronicle and its chief competitor, the Houston Post, have taken on aggressive advertising campaigns and promotions during the last year.

In July, the Chronicle launched an extension of its image-oriented "celebrity series" ads with a campaign themed, "Year after year, story after story, Houston's leading newspaper is the Chronicle." The strategy of this campaign was to reinforce the Chronicle's claim to be the newspaper in town with spots picturing events of recent history, showing how they were covered by the Chronicle and indicating that more Houstonians read about these events in the Chronicle, according to Mr. Holt.

And today, the Chronicle begins a new extension to its ongoing image year-in, year-out series with a new campaign. The campaign includes five 10-second tv spots picturing various aspects of Houston, including sports, arts and business, in quick visual association with the Chronicle. Agency for the Chronicle is Rives, Smith, Baldwin & Carlberg/Y&R, Houston.

While the Chronicle has been an all-day newspaper since 1980, the new campaign marks the newspaper's first "all-out" move by the Chronicle to "promote the availability of the Chronicle, morning and evening by home delivery," Mr. Holt said.

"Before, if you wanted to read a paper in the morning, you read the Post," he said. "Now people in Houston have a choice of morning edition papers and more readers are reading the Chronicle; our circulation numbers prove it."

In November, the Chronicle began use of its first offset press, a nine-unit Rockwell-Goss Metroliner, which allows the Chronicle to run special sections using quality paper. Mr. Holt said the Chronicle plans to run "as many special sections using the offset press as often as press costs justify."

The Chronicle underwent no major changes in editorial staff or in editorial layout during the last year, with the exception of the business section addition with the Financial Times.

Howard Publications

Howard Publications, Oceanside, Cal., is the nation's 64th largest media company, with revenues estimated by Advertising Age of $139.5 million in 1982, all from its media holdings. The total is a 22% increase from restated estimated 1981 revenues of $114.4 million. Media contributions come from newspapers, cable and a leading tv station in Buffalo, N.Y.

Robert S. Howard, founder and owner of the privately held company, declined to release any specific financial figures, but estimated that revenues at his company in 1982 were "in excess of $100 million."

Howard bought two Iowa daily newspapers in early 1983 from W.H. Hartman Co., a private corporation in Waterloo, Ia. That move brings the company's newspaper ownership to 20 dailies and a total circulation of 460,000. The 60,000 circulation increase over 1981 is a direct result of the purchase of the Waterloo Courier, an afternoon paper with a daily circulation of 54,000, and the Cedar Falls Record, a morning daily with a circulation of 4,500. Mr. Howard declined to reveal the purchase price.

Over-all newspaper circulation was up 1.5%, excluding the acquisition of the two Iowa newspapers, said Mr. Howard. "Advertising linage was flat, but our dollars were up over-all. We weathered the recession pretty well and like everyone else, we're trying to climb out of a rut."

One goal for 1983 is to "grow a bit," said Mr. Howard, who doesn't rule out plans for new acquisitions and says the company has no plans to sell any of its daily newspapers, which range in size from the Cedar Falls paper to the Hammond (Ind.) Times, an evening paper with a circulation of 72,000.

Howard's largest newspaper, however, is feeling the strains associated with the distressed steel industry in Indiana, according to employes at the Hammond Times. Although circulation of the Times grew slightly in 1982, up about 2,000 from 69,774 in 1981, Mr. Howard would not comment on whether the paper was a moneymaker.

Howard's only broadcast property is WIVB-TV, a CBS affiliate in Buffalo. Howard bought that station in 1977, and since then, the company said, earnings have risen steadily.

But the company seems most interested in the growth of its cable tv ventures, which Mr. Howard said he is "quite pleased" with to date. The move started in 1981, when Howard entered a joint venture with Donrey Media Group, Fort Smith, Ark., to buy Overthrust Cable TV, a franchise in Evanston, Wyo. In 1982 the two partners bought 80% of Falcon Communications, a cable franchise company based in Los Angeles. Last year at this time, Falcon had only 10,000 cable subscribers in three suburbs of Los Angeles, but the number of subscribers has increased to 35,000, and more towns will soon be added, said Mr. Howard.

Ingersoll Newspapers Co.

Ingersoll Newspapers Co., Sharon, Conn., is the 84th largest media company, with media revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE of $95.0 million, compared to estimated media revenues of $87.5 million in 1981.

Ingersoll, which publishes 24 daily newspapers and more than 20 weeklies in 11 states, is known in the business as a "newspaper doctor" which assembles syndicates to purchase ailing newspapers, often taking an equity position and then managing the papers.

Structurally, Ingersoll is different than other media companies in this issue in that it operates as a confederation—various properties, all managed and some owned in part by Ingersoll Newspapers, for which there is no consolidated financial report. "It is the closest thing to being public without being public," quips Ralph Ingersoll II, president of each corporation.

Ingersoll Newspapers was founded in the mid-1950s by Mr. Ingersoll's father, noted editor and publisher Ralph McCallister Ingersoll. The elder Mr. Ingersoll was managing editor of The New Yorker magazine from 1925 to 1930. He later was publisher of Time, Life, Fortune and Architectural Forum magazines and organized investors to publish PM, a daily evening newspaper in New York City.

One of the first papers in the Ingersoll operation was the Pawtucket-Central Falls (R.I.) Times, which is the paper where the son began his newspaper career. The elder Ingersoll is no longer active in the company.

The lineup of Ingersoll newspapers indicates there are several criteria for inclusion in the group: A suburban location and financial "basket cases" generally suffering from union problems, as Mr. Ingersoll says.

Suburbia is increasingly becoming a factor of ownership "because papers in the suburbs generally offer better growth potential." For example, Ingersoll Newspapers bought from Times Mirror Co. this February the Orange Coast Daily Pilot in Orange County, a 40,000 daily serving Costa Mesa and Newport Beach, Cal.

"The paper was in trouble," says Mr. Ingersoll, "due partly to the application of large-scale operational methods on a small paper." The growth potential, however, is there, perhaps as much as a contract printer as a newspaper, he adds, noting that the well-equipped physical plant at the Daily Pilot attracted Gannett to contract printing of USA Today for the Los Angeles-San Diego corridor.

Concerning union problems, Ingersoll's Royal Oak (Mich.) Tribune and Massillon (O.) Independent were embroiled in labor disputes at the time of their acquisition. But Ingersoll, despite experience gleaned from negotiating with the 52 locals around the country, is not free of its own union problems. The Delaware County (Philadelphia) Times' plant was fire bombed and the newspaper trucks machine-gunned in a labor dispute which Mr. Ingersoll attributed at the time to poor management.

"Our philosophy is that in a capitalistic society, labor problems usually are caused by management," he says. Unions, even if they are partly the culprit, rarely ever discipline people when they are really out of line, he adds, plugging management's capability of applying swift disciplinary measures.

Ingersoll's acquisition this March of the 40,000-circulation Terre Haute (Ind.) Tribune-Star came at a time of a union-management confrontation that had interrupted production and contributed to financial problems. In mid-May, the morning Star and evening Tribune were merged into the Tribune-Star to be operated solely as a morning paper seven days a week. Mr. Ingersoll now calls the paper "one of the brighter stars in our firmament."

Ingersoll dailies which have approximately a 550,000 total circulation—its weeklies and shoppers push that up to 1.2 million on a given day—rely heavily on circulation for revenue because most are located in the older, northeastern markets, where the advertising base is generally smaller than in the rest of the country. "We have the Pottstown (Pa.) Mercury (30,000 circulation), six-day daily with no Sunday edition, and yet we charge 30 cents per issue. To do that, we must offer them something."

That something is editorial. On average, Ingersoll sets aside 12% of its newspaper budgets for editorial, compared with the average for the suburban press of about 9%. The Pottstown paper and the Trenton (N.J.) Trentonian have both won Pulitzer Prizes under Ingersoll tutelage.

The Trenton paper, in fact, is one of Ingersoll's success stories, its biggest operation and the paper facing perhaps the stiffest competition among its markets. Ingersoll bought the Trentonian in 1961 when it had circulation of about 35,000 and hardly a long shot in a market dominated by the then 80,000-circulation Trenton Times. The company has since built the paper into the lead daily while the Times passed from family ownership to two more owners.

Mr. Ingersoll says the company has been able to direct the paper past the Times in daily (not Sunday) circulation despite what he calls unfair circulation policies of the competitor. The Washington Post Co., in fact, was successful in prosecuting circulation personnel who served during its ownership at the Times prior to its sale in 1981 to current owner, Allbritton Communications. A case is now being heard in federal district court in Newark in which Ingersoll is charging the current owners with circulation fraud. The Audit Bureau of Circulations also is a co-defendant in the suit. Mr. Ingersoll is seeking an independent audit of the circulation of the two papers.

Jefferson-Pilot Corp.

Jefferson-Pilot Corp., Greensboro, N.C., is the nation's 79th largest media company, with media property revenues of $101.1 million in 1982, or 10% of total revenues of $1.02 billion. This represents an increase of 10.6% from 1981's media revenues of $91.4 million, or 9% of total revenues of $978.7 million.

Earnings from media properties remained about the same, however, $9.98 million in 1982 compared with $9.93 million in 1981.

Total profits for the publicly held company, whose primary interest is in insurance, were $86.2 million, off from the previous year's $100.4 million.

The broadcast division contributed 58% of total 1982 media revenues, or $58.5 million, from its two tv and 11 radio stations. Publishing revenues in 1982 were $42.6 million from six daily and 12 nondaily newspapers and 18 shoppers. Net income from broadcasting was $6.97 million last year, up slightly from $6.94 million in 1981. Publishing concerns showed a small increase in operating income, to $2.98 million from $2.95 million.

It was not a good year in general for the 80-year-old company, and news from the media divisions was decidedly mixed. While the publishing arm achieved both record sales and earnings in 1982, the broadcasting division experienced a loss in operating income. Increased broadcasting costs outstripped revenue gains, and earnings of $5.42 million were brought up to $6.97 million through capital gains realized on sale of real property in Miami.

Wallace Jorgenson, president of Jefferson-Pilot Broadcasting, attributed the disappointing showing to generally unfavorable changes in the marketplace. He pointed out that though five of the company's six a.m. radio stations were down in 1982, four of five fm stations posted gains. "It's a changing marketplace out there," he said. "And I'm sure we're not unique in our company."

Mr. Jorgenson added that most of the company's a.m. stations have been converted to stereo in anticipation of a resurgence of the medium. "We believe in the future of a.m.," he said.

On Feb. 7, WGBS (am), Miami, changed its format from adult-contemporary to news-information. "It's a little early yet," Mr. Jorgenson said, "but we're getting excellent audience reaction and good response to our sales calls."

In tv, Mr. Jorgenson said that both WBTV in Charlotte, N.C., and WWBT in Richmond, Va., are doing better than they were last year, and that new technologies are being implemented that will enhance their marketability considerably.

Both WBTV and WWBT are being prepared for teletext services, alphanumeric information that would be broadcast simultaneously on the vertical blanking interval of the television signal. WBTV, a CBS affiliate, would offer both network and local teletext programing, while WWBT, an NBC affiliate, would carry only the network service.

Recent advances in the company's Electronic News Processing (ENP) system are sure to affect both tv and radio operations. The system, which employs computer terminals to keep track of and process recorded news, has been expanded to include a cataloging capacity, so that a listing and description of past stories on a particular subject can be obtained instantly.

Introduced at the National Assn. of Broadcasters convention in April, the latest ENP incarnation was enthusiastically received. "We made sales right there on the floor," Mr. Jorgenson said. "We've never done that before." Mr. Jorgenson said plans to lease the system to other stations were well under way.

On the programing side, the company last year entered into a joint venture with Raycom Communications to produce Atlantic Sports Programming, a three-year contract for $18 million. "It's a very, very hot package," Mr. Jorgenson said. The company broadcast 37 Atlantic Coast conference college basketball games throughout the season, including the Atlantic Coast Conference basketball tournament, to a regional network of tv stations ranging from Baltimore, Md., to Atlanta.

The games were transmitted via cable to the rest of the nation by Entertainment & Sports Programming Network. Mr. Jorgenson characterized the venture as a great success, and said, "we're looking at other possibilities like it."

Perhaps the most important development in the broadcasting division, however, was the establishment of the Jefferson Group to provide marketing consulting services to the broadcasting industry. Organized as a separate division, the group was started, Mr. Jorgenson said, in order to capitalize on vendor sales obligations, a heretofore improperly tapped source of advertising revenue. The group seeks out marketers that have built up vendor obligations in a certain area, and helps them develop promotional packages for retail outlets. While the company's station might not be the sole beneficiary of these efforts, Mr. Jorgenson said, "they're going to get the bulk of it, and besides, it's new-found money."

Mr. Jorgenson said he is confident that this and other developments bode well for the company in 1983. "It's looking better," he said. "Nothing dramatic, but a slow and steady improvement." The company continues to be interested in acquisitions, major market radio and top 100 market tv stations, preferably in the Sunbelt area.

Jefferson-Pilot Publications experienced less action in 1983 than its broadcasting counterpart, but had a more satisfactory result. Charles Stout, vp-finance, said the record year was primarily the result of "management changes and more emphasis on internal controls."

Among management changes were the installation of Mr. Stout himself, as well as the elevation of Richard Cosgrove to president and publisher of the Clearwater Newspapers in Florida.

In terms of acquisitions, the division last year bought the Palmetto Press and two neighboring shoppers in Florida. Combined with the division's daily Clearwater Sun, the acquisition gave the company a strong presence in the Tampa-St. Petersburg market.

Also during the year, the Laredo Times and the Texas City Daily Sun in Texas were both switched from afternoon to morning publication, a move Mr. Stout said "was very well received, especially with advertisers."

Mr. Stout said the division is looking forward to another record profit year, adding that, "We're certainly looking for any acquisition that might come along."

When the Brewers were minor league

By Lisa Wells

For tv engineer George Kasdorf, the biggest change between then and now is the amount of equipment he had to lug around.

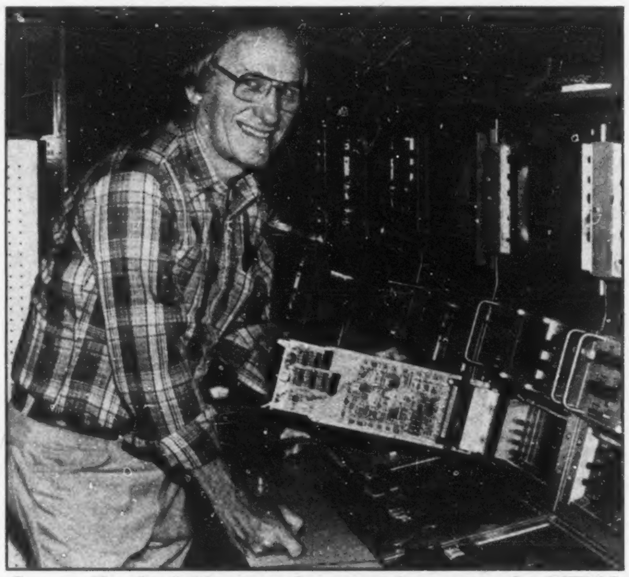
"When we did the state fair, we'd be out there every day and we used to have to pull a cable along with us to get to the different parts of the fair," he remembers. "There were no double microwaves, so we had to haul the transmitter on top of the grandstand and that would be the place we had to get all our signals to."

There were no minicams in 1947.

There were also no cable franchise fights, no low power tv stations, and an A.C. Nielsen Co. share never fell far below 55% either. Mr. Kasdorf's memories of the early days of broadcasting are a far cry from the reality of today's cool electronic sophistication, a reminder of how far the tv industry has progressed.

Mr. Kasdorf, 59, started out as a boom man more than 35 years ago at WTMJ-TV, Milwaukee. He studied at the American Television Institute in Chicago, and when he graduated—his final project was to build a tv set—WTMJ-TV called him up and asked him to come to work.

The Journal Co.-owned station was hungry to get on the air. On Jan. 4, 1941, it became the first to apply to the Federal Communications Commission for a commercial broadcast license, but World War II broke out before it could begin broadcasting. Finally, on Dec. 3, 1947, WTMJ-TV made its debut as the first tv station in Wisconsin, one of the first NBC affiliates and the 10th independently owned station in the country.



George Kasdorf, 59, started out as a boom man for WTMJ-TV, Milwaukee, more than 35 years ago.

"Meet Your Neighbor," the station's first show, was set up in the lobby to accommodate the number of city officials and community groups coming in and out of the station. For the station's evening shows, Mr. Kasdorf and the other engineers would have to haul the equipment back into the cramped quarters known as WTMJ-TV's control room. The room, about 20 ft. by 30 ft., is now one of the station's conference rooms.

Much of the station's early programing was sports—Marquette University basketball games, bowling and baseball. It covered the Milwaukee Brewers when they were a minor league team. One of its most popular shows was Thursday night wrestling, sponsored by Gettelman's beer. "The announcer would pour the beer and of course he couldn't drink it so we had a pail underneath the table we'd dump it in," says Mr. Kasdorf.

Commercials were part of the monotony of early tv as everything had to be done live, over and over again within a short period, because many advertisers sponsored whole shows.

Mr. Kasdorf's favorite was a spot for Geiser potato chips: "There would be a whoosh and the mountain would blow its top," he says. "The water would come bursting out. It was just a matter of pulling something from underneath—every time we'd do it live."

There were also other technical problems. Cameras would get memories of the commercial's lettering if they stayed on a commercial card too long.

"So this one camera was taking a shot of popcorn and there were two different sizes of popcorn—Big Buster and Little Buster—and that was burned in," Mr. Kasdorf says. "Then we had this kitchen show on so the next shot the camera took was a picture of the cook and her assistant."

Head cook Brita Griem was a rather large woman while her assistant was quite petite. Tragic, no; embarrassing, yes.

Yet for all the lugging of equipment and extra inning ballgames and geyser-spouting commercials, Walter Damm, the station's original manager, estimated in early 1948 that WTMJ-TV would make about $100,000 in its first year—the average price of one network prime time 30-second spot now. And that was when the station could claim a monopoly market on the 500 or so tv sets in Milwaukee. WTMJ-TV didn't get its first competition until seven years later when in October, 1954, WISN-TV, the ABC affiliate, hit the air. AA its newspaper operations for 1982.

But the company showed gains in its printing divisions, health in its electronic media and growth potential in its shoppers. Even in heavy-industry hometown Milwaukee, kicked hard by recession, the flagship Milwaukee Journal and Sentinel newspaper properties are described by a company spokesman as "doing well in the rather poor Milwaukee market." Circulation performance for the two big Milwaukee dailies was mixed.

The Audit Bureau of Circulations March, 1983, audit put the morning Sentinel up from 176,680 in 1982 to 181,957, while the evening Milwaukee Journal slipped from 308,764 in 1982 to 307,806.

Bright spots for the Journal Co. are in tv, radio, printing, local weekly newspapers and shoppers. Teltron Inc., a suburban Milwaukee cable system, was added during the year.

Tv station KNTV, an ABC affiliate in Las Vegas, Nev., ranked third in its three-station market when the Journal Co. acquired it in 1979. Under its new ownership, KNTV built a new antenna, had the first minicams in Las Vegas, and by 1981 moved into second place. Now it is first in news and tied for first in other areas.

The year has been "much improved" for the WTMJ broadcasting properties, including WTMJ-TV, WTMJ (am) and WKTI (fm). (See story above.) The company once again has broadcast rights for the Brewers baseball games and will continue carrying Green Bay Packers football, Milwaukee Bucks basketball, Milwaukee Admirals hockey, and a menu of University of Wisconsin events.

A spinoff of WTMJ Inc. operations is Teltron Inc. Electronic Informations Systems, which serves west and northwest suburbs of Milwaukee with cable channels carrying news and advertising. Richard Herbst was shifted from his post as WTMJ general manager to the executive vp of Teltron.

Despite cutbacks of classified and real estate advertising, the Journal Co. sees "real growth potential for Add Inc." according to a company spokesman, which publishes six shoppers in Wisconsin, two in Montana, and Choice, a magazine based in Fort Collins, Colo.

As its most favorable development of the past year, the Journal Co. cites "good sales and earning gains in web offset commercial printing."

Tempo Inc. is the umbrella title for three major printing operations: Gugler Lithography, Milwaukee; Edward Deutsch, Cicero, Ill., and Norway Gravure, Norway, Mich.

Also big in the Journal Co. printing category is Perry Printing Co., Waterloo, Wis., with a second web offset plant in Baraboo (as of 1982), which is the largest printing facility in Wisconsin, running publications including Time, Sports Illustrated, People and Journal of the American Medical Association.

In Fairfield County, Conn., the company owns the Trumbull Printing Co., a web lithographer combining big production runs of advertising sections and inserts with the weekly investment information tabloid Value Line. Trumbull also publishes newspapers for four bedroom communities (Trumbull, Easton, Monroe, and Huntington) in Fairfield County, which has one of the highest concentrations of corporate headquarters in the U.S. The company sees the Trumbull operation as a hopeful source of increased markets.

Teleport, Skokie, Ill., supplies communications satellites to feed signals to Chicago-area broadcasters for pickup and transmission. While this system is not completely in place yet, Teleport plans by July 1 to be feeding, for example, Sportsvision from Chicago's Comiskey Park (White Sox), Soldier Field and Stadium.

Knapp Communications

Knapp Communications, Los Angeles, is the country's 94th largest media company, with media property revenues for the fiscal year ended Jan. 31 of $79.7 million, or 91% of Knapp's total revenues of $92.9 million.

In fiscal 1982, the privately-held company, which will not disclose earnings, had media revenues of $64.5 million, or 86% of total revenues of $74.5 million.

The company's biggest challenge in the past year has been the relaunch of Geo. The first issue under the direction of Knapp editor-in-chief Paige Rense was dated April, 1982. According to magazine group publisher Harry Myers, the rate base of the natural history, travel and photojournalism magazine will be raised in September to 255,000, following a raise in September, 1982, to 225,000 from 200,000. Mr. Myers said that for the first six months of 1983, Geo was up 70% in ad pages and 85% in revenues from last year. As reflected by the increases in rate base, it was up 25% in circulation. "Renewals are very strong," Mr. Myers said, "and our advertising research shows that the direction is right."

Since acquiring Geo from German publishing company Gruner & Jahr, the company has revamped its design and editorial focus. The May, 1983, issue, for example, has a cover story on the koala bear; a photo essay on England's Lake District, the inspiration of 19th century poets, and 14 pages of pictures of figure skaters. This contrasts with the May, 1981, Geo, which did a major feature on Mexico City titled "Omens of Apocalypse"; stories on aquaculture, and a report on the people of Tibet.

Architectural Digest also increased its rate base in January, 1983, by 50,000 to 600,000, and its ad rates by 12.5%. Mr. Myers said AD is down 1% in pages and up 7% in revenues through July of this year, compared with the previous year.

Bon Appetit, which currently has circulation of 1.3 million, is down 2.1% in pages and up 4.5% in revenues, while Home, which Knapp in a partnership last year acquired and revamped, is up 36% in pages and 44% in revenues for the first six months.

In 1982, the company had disclosed plans for new magazine ventures, but these have been shelved for the time being. "We've had to work hard as a small company to wrap our resources around two acquisitions in one year," Mr. Myers said. "I think we've done a good job—it would be a big job for even the biggest companies."

Last year, Knapp had plans for a French edition of Architectural Digest, but according to Swift Lockard, vp-assistant to the chairman, the French economy made the environment inappropriate for such a launch. Japan is the next international market for AD, with the introduction scheduled for September. The company also is working on a contract with a Brazilian publisher to take the magazine to South America for the first time.

Knapp also is publishing and marketing a series of fine art posters in conjunction with the 1984 Olympics in Los Angeles. The exhibition of posters by 16 American contemporary artists is scheduled for a tour of major U.S. cities. Knapp is planning a direct mail campaign to sell the posters beginning in July.

In personnel changes at the company during the last year, George H. Oestreich Jr. moved from publisher of Architectural Digest to publisher of international editions of all Knapp publications, a new post. Mr. Myers said he is not recruiting for the publisher job at AD, implying strongly that Mike Stanke, associate publisher, will get the job.

Knight-Ridder Newspapers

Knight-Ridder Newspapers, Miami, the country's eighth largest media company, had media revenues of $1.30 billion in 1982, or 98% of $1.33 billion in total revenues. That represents an increase of 8.2% from 1981, when the company had media revenues of $1.20 billion, or 98% of $1.24 billion in total revenues.

Earnings in 1982 totaled $102.9 million, up 2.6% over the $100.4 million recorded the year before.

Newspapers make up the bulk of the Knight-Ridder empire. In 1982, they accounted for $1.21 billion, or 91%, of the corporation's revenues. Other sources of income during the year were Commodity News Service, which contributed $30.1 million to the corporate total; broadcasting, $43.3 million, and books, database publishing and other operations, $46.0 million.

Though the company continued to make financial gains, as reflected by its performance figures, the year 1982 proved to be a test of its ability to withstand a constipated economy. For instance, full-run advertising linage dropped by 6.2% compared with the 1981 level. Retail linage, the largest category, dropped by 2.4%.

In addition, revenue from classified advertising—an area hit hard by the effects of high unemployment and a soft real estate market—dipped to $262.5 million, down 5.9% from 1981 levels.

Still, total newspaper ad revenue managed to increase by 4.3% to $936.1 million.

What did help the newspaper segment were the strides Knight-Ridder's two Philadelphia papers—the morning Inquirer and the afternoon Daily News—made in 1982. After Charter Co.'s Philadelphia Bulletin folded in January of that year, the Inquirer and Daily News, acting on a carefully devised plan, moved to build themselves up on the Bulletin's ad linage and circulation. Total full-run linage in both papers increased to 67.4 million in 1982 from 62.5 million in 1981. The Bulletin recorded 23.3 million lines in 1981, its last full year of existence.

Circulation gains were more dramatic. For the six-month period ending March 31 of this year, the Inquirer's daily circulation stood at 544,777, an increase of 16% over the same period in 1982 and 27% above 1981, when the Bulletin provided competition in the market. Moreover, its Sunday circulation now exceeds 1 million.

The Daily News' circulation, in the meantime, stood at 295,732, up 15% over 1982 and 27% over 1981.

The two papers' unquestioned domination of the Philadelphia market enabled them to surpass the flagship Miami Herald in contributing to the Knight-Ridder revenue coffers. They accounted for 20% of the company's revenues in 1982, compared with the Herald's 17%. After the Herald came the Detroit Free Press, 10%; the San Jose Mercury and News, 10%, and the Charlotte Observer and News, 5%.

Not only have the Philadelphia papers progressed financially, but the Inquirer in particular has continued to sculpt and mold a reputation of national significance. A number of articles in the last few years have highlighted the Inquirer's efforts to build up its national and international coverage under the leadership of executive editor Gene Roberts. They have also recounted the paper's arm's length of Pulitzer Prizes of recent years.

The Miami Herald, meanwhile, saw revenues decline by 3.6% to $224.9 million in 1982; full-run ad linage also dropped, from 72.1 million in 1981 to 60.0 million a year later. Circulation of the morning paper stood at 443,565 at the end of March, a 2% increase over last year. Sunday circulation stood at 533,539.

During the year, the Herald continued to push into the affluent Broward and Palm Beach Counties north of Miami, challenging local papers owned by Tribune Co. and Cox Enterprises. Additionally, two new offset presses, part of the Herald's $30 million expansion program, started rolling.

In Detroit, Knight-Ridder's Free Press faced the vise formed by a slumping economy based on automobile manufacturing on the one hand and competition provided by the Evening News Assn.'s News on the other. Nevertheless, the Free Press did manage to eke out an increase in revenues, to $125.6 million in 1982 from $124.7 million. But that came on the strength of ad rate increases; ad linage was down to 25.7 million in 1982 from 28.6 million the year before.

The paper also managed to make slight gains in circulation, this in one of the most competitive newspaper markets in the U.S. In March, the Free Press' circulation stood at 635,740, an increase of 1% over last year, compared with the News' 651,763. In recent years, the Free Press has been closing the gap, but in the last reporting period, the News' gain was larger by more than 14,000 copies.

Elsewhere in the Knight-Ridder family, the trend toward merging evening papers into their morning sisters caught up with the company's papers in Lexington, Ky., and Duluth, Minn. In moves to cut costs, the Leader in Lexington dissolved into the morning Herald, while in Duluth the afternoon Herald merged into the morning News-Tribune.

One unique newspaper development in 1982 came with Knight-Ridder's Pasadena (Cal.) Star-News. With the ability to produced entire pages, including halftones, electronically, the paper proceeded in September to become the nation's only all-sports daily, called—logically enough—All Sports. Circulation of the paper, distributed in Southern California, was reported at 44,010 in March.

Commodity News Service, the Knight-Ridder wire service with 16,000 subscribers throughout the world, continued to grow at a relatively quick rate. In 1982, it had revenues of $30.1 million, up 12.3% over 1981. Since 1972, when the service was founded, it has grown at a compounded annual rate of 23.1%.

In the broadcasting arena, Knight-Ridder's four tv stations—all broadcasting on the vhf band—brought in revenues of $43.3 million last year, an increase of 12.5% over the $38.5 recorded in 1981. The stations, all ABC affiliates except for the unit in Norfolk, Va. (CBS), should be joined this year by WNGE, an ABC affiliate in Nashville, Tenn. In April, Knight-Ridder signed a letter of intent to purchase WNGE from General Electric Co., pending Federal Communications Commission approval.

But the biggest electronics news continues to be Knight-Ridder's forays into videotechnology. The celebrated Viewtron videotex system should go into commercial operation this fall in South Florida if it can plug into the current timetable. "This is a pioneering venture, and it carries no guarantee of success," said company president James K. Batten. "But we feel great optimism and excitement as we move toward the launch date."

The Viewtron system, a venture in which Knight-Ridder is receiving close cooperation from American Telephone & Telegraph, would provide subscribers initially with a database of information from as many as 300 advertisers. The major categories of advertisers, the company said, are likely to be travel, entertainment, retailers, auto dealers and banking.

Other media companies are certain to be following closely the developments of this interactive video system. Already, Knight-Ridder has lined up deals with A.S. Abell Co., Affiliated Publications, Capital Cities Communications, Newhouse Newspapers and Seattle Times Co. to work out joint Viewtron ventures or tests of one type or another. Each of those companies owns newspapers in sizable metropolitan markets, including Baltimore, Boston, Cleveland, Kansas City and Seattle.

Mr. Batten said Knight-Ridder has spent about $27 million since 1979 on the Viewtron experiment and expects to spend another $8 million this year. Results of a market test in Coral Gables, Fla., apparently were encouraging enough for the company to decide to continue its investment.

Cable tv has also received considerable management—and financial—attention at Knight-Ridder. The company is projecting that it will have up to 170,000 basic subscribers by the end of this year. Its cable holdings currently consist of joint ventures with Tele-Communications Inc. in New Jersey and recently acquired interests in Rockland County, N.Y., as well a venture with Times Mirror Co. in Long Beach, Cal.

For Knight-Ridder, the kind of cable systems it is seeking are "basically operations of modest size in economically attractive suburban locations," said Mr. Batten.

As with other media companies, Knight-Ridder is also investing in cellular radio technology. It has applied to the FCC to have licenses to operate the mobile-radio channels business in Austin, Tex.; Raleigh-Durham, N.C.; West Palm Beach, Fla.; Greenville, N.C.; Charlotte, N.C., and Charleston, S.C.

In major management changes during the year, Alvah H. Chapman became chairman of the company, replacing the retiring Bernie Ridder. James Batten replaced Mr. Chapman as president. Albert J. Gillen was named chairman of Knight-Ridder Broadcasting.

LIN Broadcasting

LIN Broadcasting Corp., New York, is the country's 92nd largest media company, with revenues of approximately $81.3 million from media operations in 1982, or 92% of total revenues of $88.4 million. Media revenues increased 12% from 1981's media revenues of $66.2 million, or 93% of total revenues of $71.0 million.

In 1982 approximately 82% of the company's operating income before depreciation and corporate expense was from tv, 10% from radio and 8% from radio common carriers and GuestInformant Inc., a specialty publisher that distributes advertiser-supported magazines in hotel rooms.

Approximately 81% of the company's operating income was from Texas, where it operates the NBC television affiliates in Dallas/Fort Worth and Austin, am and fm radio stations and a radio common carrier company in Houston.

Tv revenues were up 21% from 1981, with each station contributing improved margins. Last year LIN also added a fifth station to its lineup, when it purchased WOTV-TV, an NBC affiliate in Grand Rapids, Mich., for $32 million from Time Inc. Grand Rapids is the 37th-largest television market.

Over-all radio revenues were up only slightly. Revenues from the company's five am stations dropped 25% while revenues from LIN's five fm stations increased by 23% from 1981.

An active player in the radio paging business for 15 years, LIN last year laid the groundwork for a major entry into the burgeoning cellular radiotelephone industry. The company invested $1.4 million in research and development in this area.

A new technology, cellular radiotelephone, promises for the first time to provide adequate spectrum for mobile and portable telephones.

LIN last year filed applications with the Federal Communications Commission for construction permits of cellular radiotelephone networks in New York; Los Angeles; Dallas/Fort Worth; Houston; Providence, R.I.; Greater Hartford and Fairfield County, Conn.; Middlesex County and Monmouth County, N. J., and Ventura County, Cal. In Philadelphia, Allentown/Bethlehem/Easton, Pa., and Wilmington, Del., it is participating in a joint venture with the leading radio common carrier in that area.

Current thought in the electronic media

Premise 1

A decade ago, there were an estimated 65 million American households with tv sets; the three networks had a rating of about 51.5.

Premise 2

There was a dip in rating points in the 1973-74 and 1974-75 season, while the number of households with tv sets increased to about 67.5 million.

Premise 3

The steady rating decline came in the 1979-80 season, when ratings stood at about 51 points—plunging to 46.5 in the 1981-82 season. During that period, the number of American tv households increased from 75 million to more than 80 million.

Premise 4

According to Paul Kagan Associates, Carmel, Cal., the three major tv networks should make $6.6 billion in revenues in 1983, while cable networks will capture $312 million. By 1988, the networks should get about $11.6 billion, compared with $1.29 billion for the cable networks.

Premise 5

By 1993, network revenues should increase to $20.6 billion while cable network tv revenue should swell to $3.5 billion. Cable's gain obviously would be greater.

Question

Does this foretell even harder times for network tv?

Opinion 1

"Broadcast advertising is healthy and will continue to be," says Sharon Armbrust, vp-director of informational services, Paul Kagan Associates. Network advertising "is not suffering" from a theft by cable and other alternatives, she says.

Opinion 2

"Cable is being forced into a transition period. Outside of movies, it has not fulfilled its mandate on programing," Edward J. Atorino, first vice president at Smith Barney Harris Upham & Co. "The erosion [of network shares] is expected to continue but I don't see a collapse. By 1990, they will have the same number of homes as today."

Opinion 3

"Look at the problem cable is facing: The hope ot technology has been dashed or deferred, or postponed," Mr. Atorino says. "Two-way systems are not being built or may never be built; it's just not economically feasible."

Opinion 4

"There will be an increase of 2% in television households per year," says John Reidy, an analyst with Drexel Burnham Lambert. "Time spent with television sets will increase a few percentage points."

Opinion 5

There's "no question" that the networks' share of viewers has dropped, says Anthony Hoffman, another industry analyst. Their share "should drop below 70%," to as low as 67%.

Opinion 6

One other consideration: "The syndication business got hot in 1976 because independents found themselves suddenly endowed with significantly more money than they thought," Mr. Hoffman says. "That was the best year for broadcasting."

Opinion 7

But the trend toward independents and cable, Mr. Hoffman says, "will come right up against an abrupt brick wall." New federal regulations on signal importation will force cable operators to become more selective. "This will cause severe cutbacks in the import of distant signals. We probably will see stabilization of this long trend of deterioration."

Opinion 8

Will the networks recapture their audience? "Not in the form we know the networks now," Mr. Hoffman says. They'll do it "only by programing their own cable networks."

Landmark Communications

Landmark Communications, Norfolk, Va., is the country's 40th largest media company, with revenues of about $230.0 million in 1982, all from media operations. The company had about $200.0 million in revenues in 1981 and is projecting revenues of more than $250 million for 1983, how much over is dependent on the economy and a pickup in its newspaper division.

Currently, about 65% of its revenues are derived from newspapers, 10% from tv and radio (broadcast) and 25% from cable tv. This breakdown is unchanged from 1981, but new-ventures analyst Bahnson Stanley believes there could be a shift in favor of broadcast and cable this year.

That does not mean newspaper sales are expected to remain flat. Given the expectation that consumer and retail companies, auto and realty advertisers will increase linage as the economy continues to improve, newspapers should benefit. But the growth of Landmark's newspapers is not expected to keep pace with its cable tv or broadcast, where robust increases are anticipated from the company's Weather Channel.

Last year, Landmark purchased the North Lauderdale, Fla., cable system, which is adjacent to its Margate system and subsequently tied into that. It was also awarded and has begun construction on the Richardson, Tex., franchise system, a 330-mile system reaching 27,000 homes.

The development of that system also reveals Landmark's intention to concentrate cable development in the Southeast and Southwest. Last year the company began construction of a system in Arlington, Tex.

However, Landmark dropped out of its bid for a Tampa, Fla., franchise that would have been a joint venture with Knight-Ridder newspapers. Still, total subscribers to its TeleCable system stands at more than 325,000 and channel capacity at better than 21 for the country's 14th ranked cable operator.

Over-all, the company's interest in future cable developments remains centered on multipay services marketing, the development of pay-per-view, future cable systems acquisitions and increasing ad sales on cable networks.

For the Weather Channel, part of Landmark's Broadcasting & Video Enterprises division, the company has two principal objectives: To get more cable operators to carry it and to increase ad sales. Since it was introduced last summer, the Weather Channel has more than doubled its subscriber base from last year's 4.2 million subscribers. But ad sales were not as strong as hoped. The company made both low and high-end projections and the results fell somewhere in the middle. Because of the economy, many companies cut cable buys, thus affecting the channel's ad sales, which were also hampered by not being on the Nielsen meters. To qualify for the meters, a cable network has to be viewed in 12 million households. To date five cable networks have qualified and the Weather Channel should qualify by either the end of this year or the beginning of next, analyst Mr. Stanley said.

On the publishing side, Landmark did not acquire or divest any of its interests.

However, it did consolidate the news and feature staffs of its morning Norfolk Virginian Pilot and evening Ledger-Star. The move was said to result not only in cost efficiencies but in improved coverage of business, sports and naval news. Landmark also added additional free distribution papers, bringing its total up from 16 to 23 with combined circulation of more than 265,000. Noted an executive with this division, "Our goal is to provide total market coverage for large advertisers and preprint customers as opposed to letting these customers go to direct mail."

Lee Enterprises

Lee Enterprises is following doctor's orders. And some of the Davenport, Ia.-based media company properties, having dutifully taken the prescriptions offered, are shedding the pallor brought on by an ailing economy.

In 1982, Lee ranked 58th among the nation's top 100 media companies, its media property revenues reaching $158.9 million, or 99% of total revenues of $160.6 million. Media property revenues in 1981 were $149.8 million, or 98% of the company's total revenues of $153.1 million.

Last year, within the media group, newspapers accounted for $115.7 million, or 72% of the total. Broadcasting brought in $43.2 million, or 26%.

Net income for the company in 1982 was $19.8 million compared with $19.1 million in 1981, a 3.8% increase.

Lee Enterprises, including newspapers, broadcasting and graphic arts, began back in the 1890s when A.W. Lee moved from New England to Muscatine, Ia., to join his uncle's newspaper. Lee's media properties now include 18 newspapers scattered through the Midwest and Northwest, four tv stations in Illinois, West Virginia, Oregon and Hawaii and four am and fm radio stations in Illinois and Nebraska.

In the graphics arts area, Lee jointly owns Napp Systems (USA), San Marcos, Cal., claimed to be the world's leading maker of photopolymer letterpress printing plates used by the newspaper industry.

Although Lee's earnings increased last year, they were not up to expectations.

"I would be less than candid if I did not register my disappointment with the results," said Lloyd Schermer, president. Several of the company's midwestern markets were hard hit by the recession, especially in the areas where automotive, farm implement and construction equipment are dominant industries.

And, because of the ailing economy, Lee's strategy for the past two years within the newspaper group has been tinged with caution, eschewing new acquisitions in favor of improving existing operations and developing new services and products within those operations.

One method of making "good papers better" was to get some market researchers and newspaper consultants on the job. Their prescriptions helped the Helena, Mont.-based Independent Record, which was Lee's leader in circulation growth last year. It also helped the Quad-City Times, in Davenport, Ia., whose achievement deserves particular credit as its growth has occurred in a market smarting under 20% unemployment.

Two years ago, the Times began using the services of Stuart Schwartz, a newspaper consultant and professor of journalism at Georgia State University. Initially, his findings that the Times readers thought the paper "dull" rankled many staff members.

"This joker comes from Georgia and tells us we're dull," said one. Since then however, prodded by the recession, several of Mr. Schwartz' suggestions were used. As a result, the editorial format of the paper has changed "drastically," says Ronald L. Rickman, publisher. The stories, Mr. Rickman said, are shorter, more "hard hitting. There is more spot color and more crime news," he added. "We found out how much he [Mr. Schwartz] really did know.'

The results are telling. From May, 1982, to May, 1983, according to Mr. Rickman, the circulation of the Times increased 2,000 daily to 65,353 and more than 1,000 on Sundays to 85,702. And the circulation increase is not a result of the paper selling itself cheaply against its major competitors, the Rock Island Argus and the Moline Dispatch. Indeed, during its renovation, the Times increased its price 17%, up to $2.40 a week, compared with $1.30 for the Argus and $1.50 for the Dispatch.

In addition to its circulation gains, last year the Times won the Iowa Press Assn.'s "newspaper of the year" award (against some 44 other dailies), as well as the general excellence award for 1982 and, recently, for 1983.

However, individual performances varied from market to market, reflecting both the health of the local economies and steps taken by Lee to make the papers more attractive to readers. Some did well, others did "lousy."

For example, the Bismark (N.D.) Tribune, with its petroleum and natural resource base, fared far better than did the Montana Standard in Butte, where a mining company—a major local employer—pulled out completely.

And style varies as well, depending on the markets, which can range, said Steve Sturm, director of newspaper development for Lee, from the "Rocky Mountain chic" of Missoula, Mont., to the industrial blue collar audience of the Quad-City Times.

Some of Lee's improvements last year were: The expansion of the computerized circulation system (LINSS) to include the Bismark Tribune and the Decatur (Ill.) Herald and Review, bringing the number of markets online to nine. Started in 1973, the system has cost Lee some $7 million and is so sophisticated, said Mr. Schermer, that it can target out all subscribers "weighing over 200 lbs." in a particular market. Every household is on file in each of the nine markets.

And, although Lee has no cable tv properties of its own, it makes use of the electronic media in other ways. Lee's Madison Newspapers, for example, have won exclusive rights to sell local advertising on four cable networks.

Some of Lee's new products within the newspaper area geared to specific audiences include Apt, a quarterly to reach apartment dwellers and condo and duplex owners in the Madison market; newsletter services, and Montana Legislative Reporting Service, a daily update on current legislation sold to state lobbying associations.

Within Lee's Broadcast Group there was a 10% increase in revenues in 1982. According to Richard Belkin, vp-broadcasting and corporate planning, the major achievements within this group were the formation of Lee Productions, a Honolulu-based software production company; added emphasis on commercial and program production through the acquisition of Video Productions in Portland, Ore., and the growth and development of Hawaii Production Center, which received six Telly awards during the year for outstanding commercial work.

Current and future strategy in the broadcast group is to continue developing current businesses, to strenghten local marketing efforts and to emphasize local programing and news.

Maclean Hunter Communications

Maclean Hunter Communications, Toronto, Ont., is the 95th largest media company, with U.S.-only 1982 media revenues of $75.0 million, representing 18% of the company's total revenues of $427.1 million generated from Canadian, U.S. and U.K. properties.

Although revenues were up 25% from $341.2 in 1981, earnings dropped 22% in from $22.1 million in 1981 to $17.3 million in 1982. (Year-to-year comparisons made in this profile are in U.S. dollars based on the exchange rate of US$1 = C$1.229 applied to both years.)

The company attributes the drop to lower profit margins in periodicals, a major investment in a newspaper publishing group and strong investment in U.S. cable systems.

One of the toughest blows for the company was created by the Canadian economy, which Harvey Botting, assistant to the chairman, says "catches pneumonia when the American economy gets a cold."

None of Maclean Hunter's 76 Canadian business publications, including the Financial Post, a Barron's-like publication, fared well in attracting ad linage as advertisers pulled back severely in the face of Canada's recession. Profits from business publications in Canada dropped from 1981 to 1982, but the company's 29 foreign business publications —most of them in the U.S.—fared better and broke even with 1981.

Stamford, Conn.-based Progressive Grocer magazine and C-Store Business, a publication for the convenience store industry, both purchased in 1981 by Maclean Hunter Media Inc. from HP Publishing, performed well in their first full year as part of Maclean Hunter, says Mr. Botting. They yielded revenues of about $10 million, according to John Skeels, president of Maclean Hunter Media, Inc., a subsidiary of the parent company.

Although the company's business publication division didn't make any acquisitions in 1982, it did complete a major deal in March, 1983, to purchase Hospital Practice magazine, a monthly with a circulation of 200,000—mostly physicians—that has annual revenues of $7 million. Purchase price was not disclosed.

The company closed down a failing British property, British Plastics & Rubber, and sold Sporting Goods Canada. Maclean Hunter is an active buyer and seller of publications, so the act of acquiring and selling isn't particularly consequential for the company, says Mr. Botting. Maclean Hunter Media also sold its Learning Resources Division to MacMillan Publishing Co., for $3 million in 1982.

While the Canadian end of the business periodical publishing struggled, the company's stable of Canadian consumer magazines fared well despite the economy. Circulation of Maclean's, the equivalent of Time or Newsweek, held firm at 625,000 during 1982. It has a higher penetration among Canadians, says Mr. Botting, than either Time or Newsweek. Its editor, Peter C. Newman, left his post but continues to write for Maclean's. Kevin Doyle from Newsweek replaced him.

Canadian magazines Chatelaine (a women's service book), Flare (for young women), and L'Actualitie (a consumer magazine in French and English) also held their own in ad linage. The company's only U.S. consumer publication, Program Guide, a cable and pay tv guide, showed marked growth in 1982. Started in 1981, the monthly now serves eight communities and there are plans to continue expanding its coverage. It competes with Time Inc.'s monthly cable guide.

During 1982, Maclean Hunter got into the one area in which it previously had no holdings. In May, the company bought a half interest in the Toronto Sun Publishing Corp., which publishes three tabloids—the Toronto Sun, Calgary (Alberta) Sun and Edmonton (Alberta) Sun. The purchase price was $55 million and was one of the major reasons the company's 1982 earnings dropped so dramatically compared to the previous year.

Maclean made the purchase with the agreement it would leave the Toronto Sun Publishing Corp. entirely autonomous for at least five years, with no editorial interference. Maclean has two people or the board of directors.

"We had talked to them back in the '70s," says Mr. Botting, "but they weren't interested in selling. Then they came to us last year and said they'd be interested in selling a half interest, and we jumped at the chance. It's a very sound company—its management and editorial product."

The consumer publications group, not including the Toronto Sun Publishing Corp., netted revenues of $63 million. The combined revenues for the entire publishing division—consumer magazines, business publications and the Financial Post —totalled $153 million.

Maclean Hunter's broadcast division generated $41.8 million in revenue during 1982, up 8.3% from 1981 revenues. Its holdings include a tv station in Calgary, three radio stations in Alberta, five in Ontario and two in Nova Scotia. The company increased the number of Alberta radio stations to five when, in August of 1982, it started up CJAX-FM, an urban country format for Edmonton.

The cable division was one of the company's most active during 1982. Maclean Hunter increased its viewership to 925,000 households during 1982. In Ontario, it is the largest cable operation, with 70% of all homes that receive cable getting Maclean Hunter's services—16 systems serving 20 municipalities. It hasn't branched into other parts of the country yet, but the company has made significant inroads in the U.S.

Maclean Hunter added two new franchises in 1982 in Waterford and Garden City, Mich. It is the largest cable operator in New Jersey. The company will probably slow down significantly on new market expansion during 1983, says Mr. Botting. "We feel most of the good markets have been tapped," he explains, "and the ones that haven't will simply cost too much to develop. It's better to concentrate on what we now own."

Maclean Hunter has a number of nonmedia holdings in Canada that contributed about $20.3 million of the companies revenues: A radio paging company in Ontario, trade show operations, book distributing and a press clipping/direct mail service.

Although Maclean Hunter has a large printing operation, it hasn't technically been a revenue producer because it is used almost exclusively for in-house printing of trade magazines. However, says Mr. Botting, the printing operation in 1982 began soliciting more outside business and that will continue in 1983, so this year printing operations could become a more significant income-producer than in past years.

McCall Publishing

McCall Publishing Co., New York, is the nation's 76th largest media company, with total net revenues of $110.0 million in 1982, all-from media properties. In 1981, total revenues were $97.2 million.

The company is privately held by the Pritzker family of Chicago, whose other properties include Hyatt Corp., Rosemont, Ill.

About 90% of the company's revenues last year were derived from flagship McCall's. The remainder came from annual special interest publications of the magazine—McCall's Beauty & Diet Guide and McCall's Cooking School—along with Working Mother, a separate publication founded in 1979, and American Family Publishers, a subscription solicitation company, much like Publishers Clearing House, which is co-owned with Time Inc.

Just as the fate of McCall Publishing is tied to the fortunes of McCall's, the fate of McCall's is linked to the fortunes of the women's service magazine field. While 1982 was no banner year for any of the aforementioned, there are signs that 1983 could bring better times for all.

Ad pages for McCall's last year fell 9.1%, while ad revenues dipped 5%. In the first quarter of '83, however, both pages and revenues rose, as did newsstand sales, the latter despite a 25-cent cover price increase to $1.50 that took effect in June, 1982. The circulation rate base is 6.2 million; the magazine ended the last six months of '82 with circulation at 6.3 million.

McCall Publishing executives expect their premiere property to continue making gains through the second quarter of 1983 and the rest of the year. "We're feeling rather bullish about what's going on," said Raymond Eyes, president of the company and publisher of the magazine.

The officials take issue with the widely held belief that the traditional Seven Sisters women's magazines are losing ground to a new breed of publication. While it is true that "a small number of magazines with infinitesimal circulation are showing big gains," said Robert Stein, executive vp-editor, "the large magazines are finding more and more younger readers. If a small specialty magazine finds 100,000 readers in their 20s and 30s, it's proof of reaching the market, right? If a mass magazines reaches 500,000 [such readers], nobody makes that connection."

A decade ago, said Mr. Eyes, the Seven Sisters "would have given their eyeteeth" for the ad-page counts they're amassing today. "Women's service magazines, taken collectively, are selling more dollars worth to readers and advertisers than even six or seven years ago," he added.

Mr. Eyes attributed the improvements being shown by McCall's in part to a decision announced last December that ad rates will be frozen for all of 1983. Similar moves were later made by Good Housekeeping and Family Circle. It was also helpful, he said, that there were "moderating price increases from paper companies and ink companies, as well as the holding of the line and, in some cases, small decreases, from suppliers."

In future months, McCall Publishing should benefit, in Mr. Eyes' view, from "the growing realization of the erosion of television audiences. Advertisers are looking at our kind of mass vehicle [as an alternative] with every passing month." Mr. Stein predicted that "five years from now, we're going to deliver much bigger audiences than primetime shows."

To enable McCall's to capitalize on what Mr. Eyes considers the momentum of the first quarter, a variety of editorial and promotional projects are under way. There'll be a special seven-page fitness section in the July issue and an entertainment promotion in November. September will see the return of the magazine's "Reader of the Year" contest, which he said "got us lots of public exposure" its first time around last fall.

The company's optimism extends to American Family Publishers, which sells subscriptions to magazines from many publishing companies via sheets of stamps and sweepstakes. McCall Publishing and Time Inc. had been partners in AFP with Charter Co. When the latter decided to divest itself of its media operations, McCall Publishing increased its ownership from 33⅓% to 50%, effective last June 30.

The company is also optimistic about Working Mother, which Mr. Eyes said had a "fantastic" 1982. The rate base was increased by a third, to 400,000, in March, 1982. Another increase, to 500,000, is scheduled to take effect this September.

This magazine is "more highly specialized" than McCall's, said Mr. Eyes, as it "grew out of research McCall's did on our audience." It's targeted to "that group which really needs help," he said, "who work and have small children. That's also a group advertisers have a terrible time finding."

McCall Publishing hopes a better 1983 will bring an end to the once-persistent rumors of the Pritzkers' impending sale of the company. "I can't express the ridiculousness of those kinds of observations," Mr. Eyes said. "It may be that our prosperity will kind of wave that sort of gossip off."

McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, Sacramento, Cal., is the 49th largest media company, with 1982 revenues, estimated by ADVERTISING AGE, of $185.0 million, all from media operations. That represents an increase of about 15% from 1981 estimated revenues of $160.0 million.

The family-owned-and-operated business is active in newspaper, radio and cable tv and is eyeing new technologies, including videotex and cellular radio.

The $600,000 purchase of WCPT-TV, an independent station in Crossville, Tenn., fell through in July, 1982. The company now owns no commercial tv station and has no immediate plans to purchase one.

While newspapers represent more than 85% of the company's business and are still its primary emphasis, McClatchy wants to keep abreast of other communications developments. To that end, it set up a joint-venture agreement with two companies to get involved in cellular radio, the technology that will eventually make possible sophisticated transmission from cordless telephones in cars, briefcases and wristwatches. The two companies, FMI, Miami, and Cellular Communications, New York, are both partners with Western Union.

Another area of high-tech communications that McClatchy continues to examine is electronic publishing. After withdrawing from a joint venture with Time Inc.'s cable subsidiary, American Television & Communications Corp. (ATC), the company signed another one with Times Mirror Co., Irvine, Cal. The partnership calls for an investigation of videotex possibilities within the Sacramento market. A more permanent joint venture may be possible, but for the moment the company just wants a look-see. "We're just not sure where this is all headed, but we want to be on top of it if it appears to be an explosion of some sort," corporate vp, Erwin Potts said.

McClatchy hasn't added to its stable of four cable systems in the last year. Though three have increased their subscriber counts, "they haven't grown as rapidly as we had hoped," Mr. Potts said. He blamed the slowdown on the recession, which deters people from signing up for cable and increases numbers of disconnects. Norcal Cablevision, McClatchy's only mature cable system, served 25,000, as of the end of March, 1983. The drop from 37,000 (the number of subscribers given in last year's 100 Leading Media Companies report) results from a reorganization of Norcal in January, 1983. Forty per cent of the system was turned over to Viacom, which already owned it. The 60% that remains, now managed and 100% owned by McClatchy, serves four franchise areas north of Sacramento.

Fresno Cable TV Ltd., also 100% owned, serves 37,200 subscribers in Fresno and surrounding areas. All construction on the system is due to be completed this year. Tel-Cab Communications Cable, also virtually completely, serves 2,800 in the Reno, Nev., area. Sequoia Cablevision, activated in March last year, has signed up about 6,000 in the Tulare County region of Central California.

McClatchy's only acquisition last year was LegiTech, Sacramento, a computerized service for tracking state legislation and political contributions. The service is sold to magazines and newpapers for a fee.

Newspapers are still the company's mainstay. Mr. Potts professed the greatest pride in the Anchorage Daily News, which had a circulation of about 6,000 when McClatchy bought it in 1979 and now has surpassed the Anchorage Times, its main competitor, in daily circulation. According to Audit Bureau of Circulations, the Daily News' average circulation for six months ending March 31 was 48,557 daily and 50,796 Sundays. The Times figures stood at 45,351 daily and 55,792 Sunday. The paper is still operating in the red, although Mr. Potts won't say by how much. "Obviously, we have put other things in front of financial [considerations], though we would like to be doing better on the bottom line," he said.

John Morton, newspaper analyst with Lynch, Jones & Ryan, Washington, observed that the company has been deliberately losing money to win a strong market position. He estimated the loss at between $2 million and $3 million yearly. "It's a long-term gamble," he said, but added that Anchorage is not a market that would support two newspapers.

McClatchy's three Bees have weathered the recession well, though they haven't done as well as predicted. The Sacramento Bee is the strongest, but faces competition from the Sacramento Union, whereas the Modesto Bee and Fresno Bee are lone dailies in their respective markets.

The news for some of the company's smaller newspapers is not as bright. The Gilroy Dispatch, a five-day-a-week paper, has been affected by the slowdown. "Linage is not what we would like it to be," said Mr. Potts.

Gilroy lies on the southern end of the Silicon Valley and high-tech industries to the north have been badly affected by the economy.

The Tri-City Herald, a daily in Richland, Wash., has been drastically affected by the woes of troubled nearby Washington Public Power Supply System. After two partially completed nuclear power plants were scrapped in January, 1982, more than 6,000 jobs vanished overnight. While no employes have been laid off, the paper has had to make some "adjustments" in its payroll, Mr. Potts said. He predicted that agriculture and some research-oriented businesses will eventually fill the void left by the fading nuclear industry. Meanwhile, the paper's circulation has dropped to 36,547 for the six-month period ending March 31, according to the Audit Bureau of Circulations. The year-earlier figure was 39,682.

Saturday Review revisited

By Lori Kesler

When 29-year-old Jeffrey M. Gluck of Columbia, Mo., bought the dying Saturday Review last November, the skeptics immediately started sniping.

Such a high-brow magazine certainly should have a more respectable return address, they said. And anyway, how could this young upstart from the Midwest believe he could succeed where seasoned New York veterans had failed?

Perhaps the skeptics could be excused for their concerns. It's true, after all, that Columbia isn't exactly a hotbed of cultural activity. It has no professional orchestra, opera or ballet. It's a small college town that sits quietly—very quietly—in the middle of rural Missouri north of the Ozark Mountains. And the magazine's editorial offices, in the Tiger Tower apartment building near the University of Missouri campus, may be a long way from the hearts and minds of most Saturday Review subscribers.

Nevertheless, Mr. Gluck, who led a group of investors in purchasing the magazine that had lost $3 million in the last two years alone, has published two issues of SR so far—it's a bimonthly now—and he's challenging the skeptics to take a look.

"We've got all the same critics and columnists back except one who retired and one who died," he says. And SR reinstated cartoon editor Clarence Brown, who'd dropped out of the picture under the magazine's previous owners, Macro Communications Corp. of New York.

Norman Cousins, editor of SR from 1939 to 1971 and again from 1973 to 1978, remains editor emeritus, and distinguished critics such as Judith Crist, Stanley Kauffmann and William Cole still write for the magazine.

"While we recognize that New York remains the cultural hub around which much of the artistic world revolves, we see no problem, in this age of computers, express mail and telephones, in publishing from the Midwest," Mr. Gluck says. "Our columnists simply mail their copy across the country instead of across town."

Gluck: Whatever we get on advertising is gravy.

All of Saturday Review's editorial material comes from columnists and contributing editors. The staff just edits it, and that can be done anywhere, Mr. Gluck says.

"In fact," he adds, "Macro Communications could have sneaked out of New York and moved SR to North Dakota three years ago. Nobody would have known the difference."

Mr. Gluck says the magazine's editorial style won't change much because "it has always led the field in arts and literature." But he thinks its business operations in the past were "a disaster," and he's revamping the subscription and advertising structure.

When SR folded last August, it had 425,000 circulation, but its rolls were badly bloated by discounted subscriptions from service agencies that took heavy commissions. About 200,000 agency subscriptions were transferred to other publications.

When Mr. Gluck bought the magazine, the more than 200,000 subscriptions he inherited amounted to an estimated $3 million liability.

"Those people paid their money, and somebody collected it, but that money's long gone," Mr. Gluck said.

Now the magazine has 203,000 subscribers and Mr. Gluck is letting the unprofitable ones lapse while trying to build a base of full-price subscriptions and newsstand sales.

"We're not taking the route of losing money on subscriptions and making it back on advertising," Mr. Gluck says. "We'll depend on subscriptions to pay the way, and whatever we get on advertising is gravy."

He says this method of operation should make the magazine more attractive to advertisers because "they know readers who pay top dollar are the ones that really want the magazine. Discounted subscriptions, on the other hand, dilute demographics." SR is promoting subscription and newsstand sales via an ad campaign that broke in May on three cable networks and in several magazines.

Still, he thinks SR should begin to have positive cash flow before the end of this year. Advertising sales have been stronger than expected, with 22 ad pages the first issue, about a dozen the second issue and early sales of 22 for July/August. Tobacco and liquor are SR's biggest advertisers, followed by corporations, books and travel.

Some say Mr. Gluck chose a bad time to try to revive a magazine, but he thinks it may have worked out just right. "It's nice to start during a slump because you're just getting organized anyhow," he says, "so you're not losing much. Now we're getting things going, and the economy's starting to roll, too."

Mr. Gluck, a native of Chicago, left the University of Missouri in 1974 so that he and his wife, Debra, could start Campus Digest, a newspaper for students in Columbia. He set up a similar paper at the University of Illinos and later sold it.

Then in 1981 he bought Missouri Life, a slick magazine that had lost $600,000 in three years in the hands of its owner, Missouri Sports Network. Mr. Gluck bought it and trimmed expenses by reducing the number of color photographs, cutting paper quality and paying writers less. He turned a profit within 18 months.

Mr. Gluck insists he won't "go cheap" with SR, but he emphasizes that it will cost considerably less to produce it in the Midwest than in New York.

He can pay editors less in Missouri, he says, because of a lower cost of living. In addition, the staff does typesetting in-house and sends camera-ready pages to Denver, where the magazine is printed. Also, the magazine now spends about one-tenth as much money on office space as did former owner Macro Communications.

The 58-year-old SR went bankrupt in 1973 and was revived again that year by Norman Cousins, who merged it with another publication he had founded. It was sold again in 1977 and 1980. Macro Communications suspended publication last August.

In its latest reincarnation, SR costs $2.50 instead of $1.75 and, though now a bimonthly, it may return to monthly publication, Mr. Gluck says.

"Macro didn't think the old editorial formula would work. We think it will," he says. "We think their mistake was trying to make advertising the sole profit center."

Neither Mr. Gluck nor Macro revealed the terms of sale, but it's known that creditors foreclosed before the magazine was sold, so Mr. Gluck and associates bought the subscriber list and the name, but not the corporation, nor its debt.

However, to make the best offer, "we did agree to assign a certain source of income to secured creditors," Mr. Gluck says, in effect agreeing to pay off approximately $1 million in debts.

It will be a long time before the company officially becomes profitable, Mr. Gluck says. "But as far as cash flow goes, I think we'll turn the corner in just a couple of months. And that's when I'm going to feel I'm making money."

McGraw-Hill

McGraw-Hill, New York, is the country's 12th largest media company, with revenues of $804.2 million from media operations in 1982, or 67% of total revenues of $1.19 billion. In 1981, media revenues were $732.4 million, or 66% of total revenues of $1.11 billion.

Business magazines, trade magazines and newsletters, including BusinessWeek and "NuclearFuel," provided 29% of total revenues last year. A variety of information services, including "Dodge Reports" for the construction industry, Standard & Poor's debt-rating service and computerized economic databases provided another 34% of revenues. Broadcasting operations, consisting of four tv stations, contributed 6% to revenues.

Each business segment contributed operating profits somewhat in proportion to revenues: Publications, 24%; information services, 39%; broadcasting, 11%. Total operating profit in 1982 was $227.9 million. Net income totaled $110.0 million.

Recognizing the growth of new technologies as well as seeing its information and financial services increase their contributions to corporate revenues and income at a greater rate than traditional books and publications, McGraw-Hill has indicated that its future lies in expanding in this field while maintaining its established businesses.

Last year the publications company was the only major division to report a drop in profits, in contrast to large profit gains made by information and broadcast operations. The decline was attributed to cuts in spending by advertisers.

Ad pages for BusinessWeek, the company's flagship publication, also continued a decline in the first quarter of this year, 6.5%, from year-ago levels, but the total—1,026—was higher than expected, according to the company. John G. Wrede, who was appointed president of the publications subsidiary earlier this year, replacing Paul McPherson, has said there are signs that an improvement in pages will pick up later in the year. Other major personnel changes occurred in the past year as Harold W. McGraw Jr. relinquished his ceo post this spring while remaining chairman and chief of the executive committee. Mr. McGraw was succeeded by Joseph L. Dionne, who has been president since 1981.

Mr. Dionne said the company's annual growth goal remains 14% to 16%, despite the slowing of inflation, indicating real growth of 8% to 10%. For the first quarter, traditionally the company's smallest, McGraw-Hill reported revenues of $275.9 million, up 5.5%, and net income of $22.8 million, up 12.3%.

Changes at the publications division and at BusinessWeek followed months of speculation about future directions of the subsidiary. Mr. McPherson, who had been president of publications for three years, became executive vp succeeding Gene W. Simpson, who was named publisher of BYTE and Popular Computing.

Mr. Wrede had been president of McGraw-Hill Information Systems. He was succeeded by Richard B. Miller, formerly group vp of the unit.

At BusinessWeek, a new team was installed to revitalize the business weekly. Last year, ad pages fell 10% to 4,325 from 4,845 and revenues were up less than 1% to $133.5 million.

The magazine, which the company claims led all U.S. magazines in ad pages for the eighth successive year in 1982, remained in sixth place among U.S. magazines in ad revenue, after Time Inc.'s Sports Illustrated and People bypassed it two year ago.

This spring the magazine took on a new look in a major redesign, and a new marketing strategy is in the works.

By early this year, BusinessWeek began to feel the impact of the new publisher, James R. Pierce, named June, 1982. Mr. Pierce had been publisher of Aviation Week & Space Technology, another McGraw-Hill publication. John W. Patten succeeded Mr. Pierce. For the first time, a BusinessWeek publisher became involved in editorial matters that previously had been the sole responsibility of the editor-in-chief.

On the editorial side, Stephen Shepard, (who had been editor of Saturday Review before it folded), rejoined BusinessWeek as executive editor.

In another personnel change, Richard Thompson was named ad director, replacing Orlin (Chic) Davis, who left the company. Also in the publication division, Howard Mager was named publisher of Chemical Week. The company sold Housing and discontinued Industry Mart and "Textile Week." It started two new newsletters, "Infocomm Standards" for the data communications industry and "International Petrochemical Report." A new wire service, Platt's Crude Oil Marketwire was also introduced.

In broadcasting, John Proffitt was named vp-McGraw-Hill Broadcasting Co. and general manager of KERO-TV. The company continued to upgrade its equipment and co-produced with Paramount Television a pilot for a weekly tv series focuing on personal business, planned for distribution next fall.

Newspaper names worth a second look

By Jack Hafferkamp

By their names, so shall you know them. America's newspapers carry a tradition of independence, and that spirit lives through their names as well as their editorial policies.

Besides all of our Times, Todays, Tribunes, Gazettes, Posts and Daily Newses, we share a treasure trove of curious, unlikely, pugnacious and—to nonreaders—humorous names that collectively celebrate the inventiveness of the vision of American journalism.

Where else in the world, besides Australia, perhaps, would you find the Daily Boomerang? The morning daily (circ. 8,000) in Laramie, Wyo., was launched in 1881 by western humorist Bill Nye, who named his new paper not after a throwing stick, but a donkey he couldn't get rid of. No matter how he tried to lose it, the donkey always came back.

At least Mr. Nye's paper was named for a live animal. The Watsonville (Cal.) Register-Pajaronian was named for a dead bird. Begun in 1868, the Pajaronian was Watsonville's first paper, serving the Pajaro River valley, which was discovered by Spanish explorer and governor Gaspar de Partola in the 18th century.

Pajaro is Spanish for bird, and apparently Partola applied it because he found a dead bird at the mouth of the river. Today the 13,000 circulation daily is very much alive.

There is nothing resembling a mountain anywhere near Lubbock, Tex., although one might be confused by the Lubbock Avalanche Journal, a morning daily with circulation of 58,000, serving western Texas. Apparently the paper was named in 1900, shortly after J.J. Dillard purchased the preceding Lubbock Leader. Mr. Dillard was describing his ambitions for the paper to Lubbock County High Sheriff Eastin Wolffarth when the lawman reportedly said, "Going to sweep over us like an avalanche, huh?" The rest is history.

In Elkhart, Ind., the Truth was "probably named in a dispute over accuracy." So says Anthony Biggs, publisher of the evening paper with a circulation of 30,000. Around the turn of the century, he explains, "there were two papers in town, and in a dispute over which was more accurate, one publisher said 'By God, mine is the truth.' The name stuck."

Mr. Biggs adds that the only other paper he knows of in the world with the same name is Pravda from the Soviet Union. "Please don't compare us to them," he emphasizes. "We've got a very conservative bent to our editorial policy." Truth, after all, is a relative concept.

However, another particularly upfront example of the unvarnished variety of newspaper names is the Cleveland Plain Dealer, which first appeared as a weekly in 1842. At that time owners Admiral Nelson Gray and his brother J.W. Gray said of their $1,000 investment, "Our democracy and modesty suggest the only name that befits the occasion [is] 'The Plain Dealer.' "

Perhaps the difference between aiming for the best and wishful thinking is exemplified by the Boulder (Colo.) Daily Camera. Bert Ball and Fred Johnson began it in 1891 as a weekly, and originally the pair thought they would use more pictures than other papers. In fact, they weren't equipped, and for several years the paper made do with a front page drawing of a man looking at the world with a camera.

Today the Daily Camera features color photos, and occasionally puts up with its mail being delivered to the Boulder Camera Co.

Less ambitious—at least name-wise—is Today's Sunbeam a 12,000 circulation daily in Salem, N.J. It switched from a weekly to a daily just 10 years ago, and according to staffer Ann Stewart, the cheery name sometimes causes people to assume that "we print only good news."

Another annoyance arising from the upbeat name, says Ms. Stewart, is that "when you call out of the county, say to Trenton, you often have to repeat the name many times. People don't hear it. They say, 'Today's Sunday? I thought today was Tuesday.' Last week we got letters addressed to the 'Sun-Bean' and 'Sun-Beak.' "

The Sun-Tattler, a 40,000 circulation daily in Hollywood, Fla., sometimes has similar problems. Having formed in 1942 from the merger of the South Broward Tattler and the Hollywood Sun, the paper is firmly established among local readers. But, says Gary Michalowski of the circulation department, "If I need to call a vendor out of our area, people sometimes think we must be a scandal sheet like the National Enquirer. They're leery until they find out we're a Scripps-Howard daily."

Perhaps the alltime favorite strange-till-you-get-to-know-it name belongs to New Orleans' Times Picayune/States Item. Quite a mouthful. It's an all-day paper that evolved from the consolidation in June, 1980, of the States Item and the Times Picayune. The latter was itself the result of a 1914 merger. The Picayune's roots go back to January 25, 1837.

Picayune is an adjective most often used to indicate triviality or little value. But that's not the only meaning, or it would be a genuinely bizarre choice for a name.

A picayune also was a small, low denomination Spanish-American coin that once circulated widely in the South. Editor Charlie Ferguson says it may well be that in its early days you could buy the Picayune with a picayune. AA

Media General

Media General, Richmond, Va., the 38th largest media company in the U.S., had media revenues of $248.1 million in 1982, or 58% of $429.4 million in total revenues.

This represented an increase of 26% over the $197.1 million recorded in 1981, or 54% of $366.5 million in total revenues.

Of the total, $183.4 million came from newspapers (74% of media revenues) and $64.7 million from broadcast (26%). The increase in revenues, the company said, reflected "to a significant degree the revenue contribution from the William B. Tanner acquisition." As the largest broadcast services organization in the U.S., Tanner is a big income producer, and Media General has high hopes for its performance.

Despite the rise in 1982 sales, net income of $32.5 million for 1982 was up just 3% from $31.6 million the year before, the result of a recessionary economy and declining prices of newsprint, in which the company has sizable interests.

The position of Media General today among its business peers is notable on a number of counts: For one, the company joined the Fortune 500 in 1982, ranking 495 in sales but 109 in annual earnings and 77 in net income as a percentage of sales. For earnings-per-share growth rate, Media General scored at the 21% level, putting it in a tie with the New York Times Co. for No. 1 among media companies and comparing with other media companies including Knight-Ridder at 11% and the Washington Post Co. at 6%.

Media General termed 1982 a year "of great change and accomplishment," and a company spokesman said it is now in "a change of strategy from internal growth to acquisitions complementing our company." Considerable attention was paid to the broadcast division, which it expanded by:

- Acquiring WJKS-TV, Jacksonville, Fla., for $18 million from Ziff Corp. while selling WFLA (am, fm) radio, Tampa, Fla., to John Blair & Co. for $12 million. WFLA-TV, Tampa changed call letters to WXFL-TV.
- Acquiring ABC-affiliate WCBD, Charleston, S.C., from the State Record Co. for $8 million.
- Obtaining the cable tv franchise in Fairfax County, Va., with more than 200,000 households and 600,000 viewers. (A suit filed against Fairfax Co. and others, including the Media General Cable of Fairfax County, challenges the validity of the cable tv franchise recently granted to the Media General subsidiary.)
- Acquiring, for $36 million plus an earnout, the William Tanner Co., Memphis, Tenn.

Broadcast division revenues rose by a thumping 177% over 1981, largely because of the Tanner and WJKS acquisitions, which together brought $38.3 million of the company's 1982 total revenue advance of $62.9 million. Broadcast earnings rose 15%.

In the newspaper area, a major Media General strategy now is capitalizing on its basic strength by further developing its papers in the Sunbelt and looking to more expansion in Sunbelt areas.

For the Tampa papers, the decision was made to merge the evening Tampa Times, with only 20,286 circulation (September, 1982 audit), into the morning

Tribune, creating an all-day newspaper. Circulation of the Tribune before the merger was 182,878 daily and 238,101 Sunday. Totals have since risen to 216,963 daily and 276,196 Sunday.

Both the Tampa and Winston-Salem newspaper organizations have moved into cable news. The Tampa Tribune has created the Tribune Cable Network, intended to reach in several adjoining counties and already up to its full capacity of 300 ads daily. The Winston-Salem papers have started New-Scan, a cable news service that directly links their newsroom computers with the local cable system.

While total revenues of Media General's 31 Southern California weekly newspapers increased 6.3%, profits fell because of what the company called "unusual bad-debt losses" in one of the two groups of papers, Highlander Publications, with 25 papers. Together with the six papers of Golden West Publishing, these publications in the Los Angeles-Orange County area serve a market as big as the 25th largest metropolitan area in the U.S.

Among Media General's other holdings are Cliggott Publishing Co., which publishes three medical journals, Consultant, Journal of Respiratory Diseases and Psychosomatics.

Another property, Technical Information Distribution Services, publishes Electronic Literature Review, Electronic Specification Review and Precis. It also operates a computerized listing of electronics/computer buyers for direct-mail information and promotional use.

Media General Financial Services, a major publisher of financial data and stock tables (with the Associated Press), makes its database available to national organizations such as Reader's Digest Assn. and Dow Jones & Co.

Meredith Corp.

Meredith Corp., Des Moines, Ia., is the 32nd largest media company, with revenues of $266.0 million in magazine publishing, broadcasting and cable operations, representing an increase of 12% over restated media revenues of $236.7 million in 1981.

Total revenues were $449.1 million, an 11.3% increase from 1981 revenues of $403.4 million.

Meredith, which closes its 1983 fiscal year on June 30, is expected to report only slightly higher revenues for the new year. At the end of the first three quarters, Meredith's total revenues were down from $340.6 million in 1982 to $339.3 million in 1983.

The dip was due in part to a change of ownership of its Des Moines printing operations to Meredith/Burda Co., limited partnership. Revenues for all other operations were up $3 million for the same period. Net earnings for that nine months fell 1.5% to $6.4 million from $6.5 million.

Total profits for fiscal 1982 were $26.9 million, up 5% from last year. Most of the company's profits came from an increase in tv revenues. Meredith's allied products and services, which includes its real estate service, was the only business group to show a loss in revenues for fiscal 1982.

Magazine publishing for the 1982 fiscal year accounted for about 42% of total revenues, broadcast properties, 17%. Book publishing, the largest nonmedia segment, contributed $66.5 million in revenues, or 17% of total revenues. The company also operates printing and financial services, as well as the real estate interest.

Better Homes & Gardens celebrated its 60th anniversary with a 3% increase in circulation to 8 million, and a 9% decrease in ad pages. The magazine's gross advertising revenues surpassed the $100 million mark for the first time in its history, according to the company. Metropolitan Home, upgraded from Apartment Life in 1981, posted a 6% increase in ad pages in 1982. It increased its ad rates 9% as of 1983. The magazine showed a 6.7% increase in circulation bringing it to 716,000, about 100,000 copies short of its predecessor's. Sail showed a 4.3% decrease in ad pages.

Successful Farming posted a 6.9% decline in ad pages in 1982, typical for that magazine category. It continued with its Market Call program, a free management and marketing service for farmers. The service averaged 5,000 calls per week in July, 1982.

The company bought one newspaper, the New Mexico Sun (Albuquerque), during fiscal 1982 and sold Kansas City, Mo.-based KCMO and KCEZ (fm) to Fairbanks Broadcasting Co., Indianapolis. Meredith is awaiting Federal Communications Commission approval for the sale of WOW and KEZO (fm), Omaha, Neb., to Omaha Great Empire Broadcasting, a subsidiary of Great Empire Broadcasting, Wichita, Kan. This brings the number of newspapers Meredith owns to 26 and reduces its number of owned radio stations to two.

KPHO-TV, Phoenix, and WPGH-TV, Pittsburgh, Pa., were major sources of revenue for the company. KPHO-TV is the leading major market independent tv station in the country, according to the company.

Meredith plans to use the same type of programing schedule—movies, local news and syndicated shows—it uses in Phoenix to bolster WPGH-TV, which has continued to break its own audience share and ad revenue records during the four years Meredith has owned it. Also, the company purchased NBC affiliate KSEE, Fresno, Cal., from San Joaquin Communications Corp., and it has acquired the remaining 60% ownership of WOFL-TV, Orlando, Fla., from Omega Communications.

Meredith is continuing its slow but steady entry into cable with mixed results. Meredith Video Publishing's first major venture into programing, "The Better Homes and Gardens Idea Notebook," ran on USA Network for 13 weeks and was not renewed.

The company also produced "Understanding Your Body: A Woman's Guide from Better Homes & Gardens" and after a three-month delay, licensed the videodisc project to VHD Productions, which has begun to distribute it in both disc and cassette formats.

The company's book publishing division, although showing a slight over-all increase in revenues (up 1.5% to $77.1 million) continued to post sagging retail figures from the sale of its books. Meredith's two book clubs continue to show gains however, with a membership increase of 11.6% last year. The company developed Sedgewood Press to increase the number of non-Better Homes and Gardens titles made available to its book club members.

Metromedia Inc.

Metromedia Inc., Secaucus, N.J., is the country's 25th largest media company, with revenues of $326.8 million from media operations in 1982, or 81% of total revenues of $407.1 million. In 1981, media revenues were $390.5 million, or 85% of total revenues of $461.8 million.

Broadcasting accounted for 80% of total revenues, and outdoor advertising about 1%. Operating income for the media businesses last year was $111.3 million. (Total operating income of $98.4 million was reduced by losses in the the entertainment division and corporate expenses.)

With the near completion of the upgrading of its radio and tv station lineup, Metromedia is focusing much of its activities on programing, still with an eye on possibly becoming a fourth network. The nation's fourth-largest broadcast operation is working in a variety of areas, including news, movies, talk shows and tv series, on its own as well as via partnerships with other companies.

The company entered several unusual financial transactions to fund new ventures and strengthen its position to the apparent approval of Wall Street, where analysts remain enamored of the company's performance. Earlier this year, the company's price per share of common stock rose over the $50 mark. In 1974, the stock was selling at $4.25 a share.

In one deal, Metromedia sold some of its Foster & Kleiser outdoor advertising operation assets to a limited partnership, which in turn is managed by a newly formed subsidiary of Metromedia. This resulted in new financial reporting methods that reduced total revenues and operating income and revised the ratios of contributions of various media to total revenues and operating income from the previous year. The deal provided Metromedia some of the funds it needed to purchase larger tv stations.

In 1982, the company acquired WCVB-TV, Boston, an ABC affiliate and, to comply with Federal Communication Commission regulations that limit the number of stations owned by one company to seven, sold KMBC-TV, Kansas City. WCVB is No. 1 in ratings in the Boston market.

This year, Metromedia closed the purchase of WFLD-TV, Chicago, and sale of WTCN-TV, Minneapolis. Still pending are the proposed sales of WMET an fm radio station, Chicago, and WXIX-TV, Cincinnati.

With the consummation of these deals, Metromedia's tv stations will reach 25% of U.S. tv households. The company says that according to the 1982 Nielsen Station Indexes, Metromedia's tv stations ranked first before the owned and operated stations of the three tv networks in terms of net weekly viewership.

The company's expanded activity in programing is being led by highly regarded Robert Bennett, who as president of the company that owned WCVB, Boston, came to Metromedia with the purchase of that station. He was named senior vp-tv broadcasting and production and was later elected to the board of directors. After the acquisition, BBI Communications, the production unit picked up with the station, was consolidated with Metromedia Producers Corp. Chet Collier, formerly vp-syndication, BBI, was also placed in charge of Metromedia's syndication.

The new division explored but later put on the back burner a five-day-a-week morning information series, called "America Today"; still in the works is an independent news feed that Metromedia hopes to establish, as well as a prime time news program. The company has had conversations with Turner Broadcasting System's Ted Turner regarding cooperative activities such as sharing of bureaus and other ways the two operations might combine to become more efficient.

Metromedia was also successful in saving its syndicated "Merv Griffin Show" from the also-rans and is a partner in one of the most talked about new syndicated offerings, "Thicke of the Night." This 90-minute late-night comedy, starring Canadian writer/producer Alan Thicke, is jointly produced and distributed with MGM/UA Television Distribution and Fred Silverman's InterMedia Entertainment Co.

It has been cleared in 80 markets, including 38 of the top 50, and is being considered as a replacement for the long-running "Tonight Show Starring Johnny Carson" in some markets. Johnson & Johnson, Clorox and Warner-Lambert have signed up as sponsors.

Metromedia late last year also increased the frequency of its "HealthBeat" half-hour health information series to weekly syndication from monthly. The show is hosted by Timothy Johnson, who also has been on-air medical editor on ABC's "Good Morning America" and a nationally syndicated newspaper columnist.

The company expects startup by fall of a monthly movie network with a full lineup of stations, both independents and affiliates. Although the company has not said whether it has actually purchased any films, they are to be theatrical films that have not run on the networks.

All of these activities along with its present repertoire of offerings for syndication have led industry observers to believe that the company is once again gearing up to become a fourth network, a hope that was dashed with the explosion of cable several years ago.

Early this year, Metromedia formed a telecommunications division to consolidate its growing activities in radio paging and cellular communications through the acquisition of several companies that operate businesses in eight states.

Morris Communications Corp.

Morris Communications Corp. Augusta, Ga., is the country's 73rd largest media company, with media revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE of $117.6 million in 1982, an increase of 1.6% from 1981 media revenues of $115.8 million.

Total revenues of the privately held company are estimated at $120.0 million compared with $118.4 million in 1981.

Nearly all revenues generated by Morris come from its daily and weekly newspapers in the South and Southwest. Figures do not include any contribution from Jacksonville-based Florida Publishing Co., which Morris purchased at the end of the year. The Florida Times-Union and Jacksonville Journal, the leading properties in the deal, are expected to add $80 million-plus to Morris coffers in 1983.

The acquisition, estimated between $120 million and $200 million, added three dailies and a weekly newspaper to the battery of Morris publications. Morris bought the group from CSX Corp., a railroad company in Richmond, Va.

Morris, with 14 dailies and six weekly newspapers, gained a circulation of 220,042 in the Florida deal: The morning Florida Times-Union and the evening Jacksonville Journal alone combined to add 206,000 subscribers to the Morris chain. The third daily in the deal was St. Augustine Record, a morning paper with circulation of 11,480. The weekly paper acquired was the Crescent City Courier-Journal, with a circulation of 2,150. Morris did not buy CSX's cable units, Area Communications, serving the Jacksonville area, and Clay Video, reaching into suburban Clay County.

Acquiring Florida Publishing was a "big step" for Morris Communications Corp., said its chairman and chief executive officer, William S. (Billy) Morris III, a second-generation newspaperman who is based in Augusta, the home of the company's Augusta Chronicle (60,644) and Augusta Herald (18,357).

The company also publishes the Savannah (Ga.) Morning News and the Savannah Evening Press, which have a combined daily circulation of 77,875; the Athens (Ga.) Daily News (9,800) and the evening Athens Banner Herald (12,600); the morning Amarillo (Tex.) Daily News (45,915) and the evening Amarillo Globe-Times (29,607), and the morning Lubbock (Tex.) Avalanche-Journal (60,000) and Lubbock Evening Journal (15,153). The Juneau Empire, a daily in Alaska, has circulation of 7,400.

Of its six weekly newspapers, three are in Georgia, two are in Florida and one is in South Carolina. And Quarter Horse News, its bimonthly publication with 5,000 subscribers, is based in Fort Worth, Tex.

The company is an "aggressive force that has always made money," said a former advertising representative. "Morris Communications stays in small or non-competitive markets and if it were losing money on a paper, it would sell."

The company has not made the move into the cable tv or video market, nor does it intend to, says Mr. Morris. "We're primarily a newspaper company and we intend to stay that way." But the company does have four job printing operations, all in cities where it has newspapers.

Multimedia Inc.

Multimedia, Inc., Greenville, S.C., is the country's 42nd largest media company, with revenues of $225.5 million in 1982, all from media operations. This is an increase of 16% from 1981 revenues of $195.3 million.

Broadcasting accounted for $110.5 million, or 49% of revenues, newspapers for $82.1 million or 36% and cable tv for $32.8 million or 15%. Revenues from broadcasting continued to garner the major share of the company's finances, but cable tv's share jumped from 10% to 15%, while newspapers' dropped from 40% to 35%.

Unaudited net earnings in 1982 increased 12% to $28.9 million, compared with $25.8 million in 1981.

The 1982 surge has continued through to 1983. First-quarter revenues for 1983 were up 18% to $58.3 million, while net earnings increased 17% to $5.7 million.

Multimedia was organized as a South Carolina corporation in 1968 and has most of its communications properties located in the Sunbelt. It publishes 13 daily and 26 nondaily newspaper publications; owns and operates five tv and 12 radio stations; produces and syndicates tv programing, and serves over 196,000 cable tv subscribers through its cablesystems ownership in four states.

In the Asheville, N.C., market, the Asheville Citizen Times completed the first year of its operation of News Channel 6, an experimental cable news outlet. A second cable system was also added and the service now goes into approximately 18,000 homes via leased channels.

On Feb. 28, Multimedia exchanged its NBC-affiliated tv stations in Greenville, S.C., and Winston-Salem, N.C., plus approximately $5 million for tv station KSDK, another NBC affiliate, in St. Louis. It will also reimburse Pulitzer Publishing Co., the former owner of KSDK, for approximately $3.3 million spent to equip a new tv studio and the office building in St. Louis.

Multimedia's radio stations continue to be ratings leaders in their local markets. WWNC in Asheville, N.C., has for the fourth consecutive year been accorded the "No. 1 station in the nation." According to the Arbitron ratings, WWNC has a larger audience share than any other radio station in the U.S. According to the company, Multimedia's radio stations are listened to by more than 1.6 million people each week.

Multimedia's third year in the cable business showed dramatic increases in all aspects of its operations. While revenues were up 69% from $19.4 million in 1981 to $32.8 million in 1982, operating profit increased 74% to $5.7 million from $3.3 million in 1982. The company spent approximately $19.9 million for expansion purposes, helping the subscriber base grow from 150,000 in 1981 to more than 196,000 at the end of 1982. It expects to have more than 223,000 basic subscribers by the end of 1983.

Multimedia began offering its subscribers and others home and business security in the Wichita, Kan., area through the development of Multimedia Cable Security Services. The division expects to expand such services into all of the other 90 Multimedia cable franchises in Kansas, Oklahoma, Illinois and North Carolina.

The cable division also boosted other areas of revenue, expanding the Wichita area advertising services, allowing local commercial insertions in eight channels instead of five.

In February, the company announced that it had agreed to swap three of its cable tv systems in North Carolina and $22.5 million for four cable systems in Oklahoma owned by American Television & Communications Corp., Denver. The three systems being exchanged with ATC have a total subscriber count of 9,000. The four Oklahoma systems have 30,000 subscribers.

Multimedia, which includes revenues from program production and syndication in its broadcasting revenues, had another banner year in that area. It announced a new eight-year contract with Phil Donahue for the "Donahue" show, now distributed nationally to 217 markets.

Even though "Donahue" is one of the nation's most popular talk shows and a cash cow for the company, it may also become the source of a major financial headache.

In May, a Denver court found Phil Donahue guilty of violating "the parent-child relationship" and of "outrageous conduct" because he kept a committment to a guest on two program segments for the "Today" show in April, 1980, instead of helping a mother recover her abducted child. As a result, the jury awarded damages of $5.9 million —$1.7 million in actual damages and $4.2 million in punitive—to the mother.

However, Multimedia Program Productions has filed motions for a new trial. It argues that the case involved "highly emotional circumstances of a mother who had been separated from her son at the hands of the boy's father." The motion argues that the $5.9 million judgement is "grossly excessive and clearly the result of passion and prejudice on the part of the jury." The decision on the new trial has yet to be made.

The company is the largest producer of syndicated country music programing in the U.S. In fact, for the fourth consecutive year, a Multimedia country music special, "16th Annual Music City News Country Awards," was the top-rated syndicated country music special of the year.

The company is not confining itself to traditional broadcasting areas. In December, 1982, it announced that it had entered into an agreement with the Stanwood Corp., an apparel manufacturing company headquartered in Charlotte, to become equal partners in applications for cellular radio operations in Charlotte, Asheville, Knoxville, Greenville and Wichita.

The seedier side of the powers that were

By Ed Zotti

The folks who run media conglomerates these days are sometimes accused of being faceless bureaucrats, but it wasn't always thus. The men who founded some of America's leading publications were a hard-drinking, hard-cussing bunch, including a share of borderline lunatics.

See if you can guess who was who from the thumbnail descriptions below.

1. While serving in Missouri state senate he shot a dishonest contractor in the leg when the man insulted him. He once considered a scheme to erect an advertising sign in New Jersey so huge that it could be read from Mars. A workaholic, he was notoriously foul-mouthed, mercurial and cheap. He mercilessly nagged his editors, two of whom ended up in an insane asylum. Two of his papers' favorite subjects were cannibalism and human sacrifice. Toward the end of his career he went blind, suffered a nervous breakdown and developed an aversion to noise, yet he continued to direct his newspapers. His genuine innovation in journalism was Sunday color comics.

2. One of the most vilified men in the history of journalism, he was described as the "greatest menace to the freedom of the press that exists in the country." Although he preached moralism, he lived openly with a prostitute and later with an actress. The circulation department of the newspaper he owned in Chicago was filled with hoodlums; in the midst of a literal circulation "war" some 30 newsdealers were said to have been murdered. He helped get the country into one war and tried to keep it out of another. He once threw the critic Dorothy Parker out of his house for drinking too much, whereupon she penned the following unforgettable lines in the guest book:

Upon my honor,
I saw a Madonna
Standing in a niche,
Above the door
Of the famous whore
Of a prominent son of a bitch.

3. An extreme right-winger, he was once described as having the finest mind of the thirteenth century. As a small child he had been called Roberta and dressed in girl's clothes by his mother, who was grieving over the death of her infant daughter. His father and grandfather both died in insane asylums. He had numerous obsessions, one of which was the reformation of American spelling; his paper was filled with words like thoro, clew, burocracy and philosofy. In his later years he pursued an editorial policy so reactionary that he became a national laughingstock. Nonetheless his paper for many years was the largest of its kind in the country, and he staunchly advocated freedom of the press at times when it was unpopular to do so.

4. He once suggested eugenically ill-adapted females be sterilized and employed as prostitutes for the use of men between puberty and marriage. In his youth a radical, like many of his peers he became a reactionary toward the end of his life. A shabby dresser and a heavy drinker, he founded 32 newspapers and held shares in 15 others; he also founded the United Press wire service. In 1925 H.L. Mencken described him as "probably the most successful newspaper owner America has ever known."

5. The newspaper he built went on to become the flagship in what was for a long time the largest newspaper-based conglomerate. He armed his staff with rifles and shotguns and conducted them in military drills. Virulently anti-union, he organized strike-breaking efforts among his fellow publishers; in retaliation two union men dynamited his headquarters, killing 20 of his employes. His son-in-law, to whom he bequeathed his newspaper, engineered the diversion of a river that guaranteed the prosperity of his home city while reducing other parts of the state to desert.

6. A member of a newspaper dynasty that at one point controlled the greatest circulation of any chain in America, he and his relatives in publishing pursued an editorial line so violently anti-Administration that they were accused of being pro-Nazi during World War II. Their editorials were described as ranging "from the incendiary to the psychopathic." Ironically, his daughter founded the staunchly liberal Long Island paper Newsday. But while his paper was sensational, it was generally factual as well, and as a consequence it grew to have the largest circulation of any newspaper in America.

7. His gait was so awkward he was said to look like he was walking down both sides of the street at once. His handwriting was indecipherable and he dressed like a bumpkin, but in his day he was one of the best known men in the country. He once refused a request to help save a sinner's soul on the grounds that hell was not half full enough of sinners as it was. Described as both a crank and a visionary, he ran unsuccessfully for president in 1872; the defeat so crushed him that he died shortly after the election.

8. One of the great regrets of his life was that he was never asked to serve on the board that ran Yale. The son of missionaries to China, he maintained a proprietary interest in that country throughout his career and was one of those who howled the loudest when the country fell to the Communists in 1949. His publication pioneered a style of English usage that Westbrook Pegler described as "a nervous disease of the typewriter." He was so totally lacking in mechanical aptitude that he could not learn to drive and had a hard time operating a dial telephone.

National Enquirer

National Enquirer, Lantana, Fla., is the 63rd largest U.S. media company, with 1982 gross revenues of $140.0 million, all from two publications—the National Enquirer and Weekly World News. The gross revenues were up 54% from a restated $90.9 million in 1981.

During the latter half of 1982, Weekly World News, which was started in October, 1979, began to get off the ground in a big way, said Iain Calder, the company's editor-president. When the Enquirer printing operations were moved from the Florida office to give it color printing capability, the company was left with a printing facility capable of producing 6 million tabloid newspapers a week.

Weekly World, a compilation of news, features and tidbits from around the U.S. and the world, experienced a 20% circulation increase during 1982 and now has a circulation of 800,000, with some weeks exceeding 900,000. The Florida presses crank out the weekly, which carries light features, bizarre local tales that don't make the national presses or wire services and entertainment-oriented features and stories from foreign publications. In late 1982, the publication passed the break-even point and went into the black.

Most of the advertising for Weekly World, like that of the National Enquirer, is from mail order companies. Because of its reputation in the advertising community, the company continues to have some trouble attracting major product advertisers. The company, however, has launched a major effort to woo the advertising community, said Ralph Gallagher, advertising director.

At present, most of the revenues for the Enquirer and Weekly World come from circulation sales. Both continue to be heavily newsstand-oriented, with the Enquirer holding the No. 2 position behind TV Guide in generating profits for dealers — more than $2.8 million in dealer profits during 1982—said Mr. Calder.

To continue boosting circulation in the battle of the gossip tabloids, the Enquirer sunk $30 million into a tv advertising campaign designed by Compton Advertising. Circulation for the Enquirer increased during 1982, said Mr. Calder, and the policy of heavy national tv spots is continuing in 1983. Weekly World News, which carries a lower price of 45 cents an issue, compared to the Enquirer's 65 cents, isn't getting the same kind of promotional push from the company. But the company is talking with Compton about a possible campaign for Weekly World, said Mr. Calder.

Editorially, the Enquirer remained essentially the same as in previous years, although it continued its growing emphasis on service articles on health issues. It won the Arthritis Foundation's media service award for 1982 because of its exposition of the problems of arthritis sufferers and potential cures and treatments. The Enquirer is now doing something similar with the American Heart Assn. and the American Cancer Society. These organizations monitor and check the Enquirer's copy before it goes out.

"Some journalists have criticized us for seeking the final advice of these experts," said Mr. Calder, "but we'd rather make sure we get all the information right, and they're the people who should know best if there are any mistakes." The tenor of the Enquirer's headline stories wasn't altered by actress Carol Burnett's $1.6 million suit for libel. Her award, made in 1981, was cut in half by a court and the Enquirer, said Mr. Calder, has high hopes of overturning the decision completely in 1983.

Scoops on Liberace's love life, Princess Grace's death and a murder attempt on Johnny Cash, plus early revelations of the final "M*A*S*H" script were the publication's big circulation boosters in 1982, Mr. Calder noted.

The only major staff change during 1982 was the addition of James B. Martise as senior vp-publisher. He was advertising director at Parade and was formerly with Redbook and New York magazine.

National Geographic Society

National Geographic Society, Washington, is the country's 51st largest media company. Media revenues from advertising and circulation in 1982 were $181.1 million, or 65% of total net revenues of $280.4 million. Media revenues for 1981 were $170.7 million, or 62% of total revenues of $272.7 million. Media revenue growth slowed to 6.1% last year, from 19% in 1981 as the recession hit the monthly National Geographic hard. (Total revenues in 1981 have been restated.)

The Geographic, with more than 10 million circulation worldwide, ranks among the most popular magazines ever published. For years the Society's only publication, it was joined in 1975 by a children's magazine, "National Geographic World," which had circulation of 1.5 million last year. "World" does not carry advertising at this time.

The Society's editors are developing a new travel-oriented magazine for possible introduction next spring as a quarterly. With a working title of "National Geographic Traveller," Society president Gilbert M. Grosvenor believes the new magazine's mix of where-to-go/what-to-do articles will appeal to the Geographic's existing readers, and that one million to two million subscriptions can be sold. Ads may be sold for "Traveller," but that question was still under examination this spring.

In addition to building on the Geographic's print franchise, Mr. Grosvenor is actively bidding to capitalize on the popular success of tv's "National Geographic Specials." Under his direction, the Society is trying to build a "network" of nonprofit groups, here and in Europe, that could contribute programing to a new "educational" tv service.

Though details are sketchy, and Mr. Grosvenor sees the cable tv industry in "tremendous upheaval," the Society's tv department has been adding to its staff this year, and New York ad agency Ally & Gargano was brought on specifically to work on the project. A role for advertising in the new service is possible, he said, but commercials would almost certainly be clustered at the beginning and the end of programs.

He also said he has been actively discussing the viewer appeal of such a service with Communications Satellite Corp., which plans to beam pay tv programing directly to subscriber homes from space satellites beginning in 1986.

Circulation and advertising revenue traditionally never cover the full costs of the Georaphic and the Society's other media ventures. Helping to make up the difference are revenues from the Society's extensive involvement in book and map publishing, globe marketing, and production of films and film strips for use in the schools. Over the years, it has built enough financial strength that it owns choice real estate in downtown Washington and is financing a new $30 million headquarters complex there from its cash reserves.

Because of its nonprofit status, and its other sucessful business enterprises, the Society has over its history not aggressively exploited the advertising potential of its ventures. That, Mr. Grosvenor, at 52 and completing his third year as Society president, is intent on changing.

The Geographic suffered its worst advertising year in recent memory in 1982: Ad volume staggered to 259 pages from 388 the year before; the ad sales contribution to the Society's budget fell to $22.4 million from $29.1 million. "We've recovered somewhat in the first half, but not spectacularly," Mr. Grosvenor said of 1983.

The recession sparked a belt-tightening wave at the Society "in areas not affecting editorial quality," Mr. Grosvenor said, and the $10 million needed to subsidize the magazines in 1981 shrank to $1 million in 1982.

Among the hints of a changing attitude toward ads at Geographic: Its traditional ban on proprietary drug ads was scrapped last year in favor of accepting "tasteful" advertising in this category. Though tobacco products and alcoholic beverages are still off limits in the U.S. edition of Geographic, the Society has begun accepting beer and wine advertising in its European edition. "Beer and wine are part of the way of life in Europe," said Mr. Grosvenor.

Seeking to sharpen its competitive stance vs. the news and sports weeklies, and bring its ad costs (more than $100,000 for a full-run page), the Geographic this year created a "Big G" breakout edition reaching roughly half of its 8.4 million U.S. subscriber base located in 36 major markets.

Equally significant, perhaps, Mr. Grosvenor, the fifth in his family to serve as Society president, has taken to the road with his top ad salespeople, meeting with advertisers and agencies to tell them the Geographic does want advertising, and that Geographic readers, according to what may be a first-ever study, find advertising an attractive and useful part of the magazine.

"I'm determined to get the word out," Mr Grosvenor said, "that advertising adds a dimension to our magazine that's wanted."

For the moment, Mr. Grosvenor indicated, circulation of the Geographic may have peaked. There was a decline of about 250,000 to 10,613,599 last year, and expectations are for another slide, to about 10,500,000 this year. But executives like to point out that in 1960, the Geographic was barely more than two million.

Whatever its current challenges, the Geographic remains one of the most successful magazines in modern publishing. At the turn of the century, the Society began developing a mass market for general interest magazines on science and geography. Alexander Graham Bell not only invented the telephone, but, as president of the Society, he also put together a magazine marketing strategy that clicked: Coupling subscription to the magazine with Society "membership," giving customers a sense of participation in the stories being covered.

New York Times Co.

New York Times Co., New York, the country's 11th largest media company, had revenues from media operations—newspapers, magazines and broadcast and cable tv stations—of $890.6 million in 1982, up 11.5% from the year before. Media accounted for 95% of the company's total 1982 revenues of $933.7 million. In 1981, media revenues were $796.6 million, or 95% of total revenues of $841.7 million.

Remaining contributions came from the company's books, information and education divisions, as well as interest income.

Net income for the company was up 8.6% to $54.3 million from $50 million, while the total revenues of $933.7 million represented a 10.9% increase over $841.7 million in 1981.

For the New York Times Co., 1982 was a year of almost unparalled growth for all of its divisions. The company added nine daily and three weekly newspapers to its group of regional papers, bringing the total number to 30. The New York Times, the company's flagship publication, increased its advertising linage more than 2% to a record 100.5 million lines, while its circulation grew to 929,000 daily copies, approximately 16,500 copies over 1981's average. Sunday circulation was up 38,000 copies to 1.52 million. The national edition of the Times, now selling about 100,000 copies daily and 200,000 Sunday, was further bolstered by the addition of a printing plant in Torrance, Cal. NYT Cable TV, the company's cable system in southern New Jersey, now has some 100,000 subscribers. Reflecting this growth, the dividend on the company's Class A and Class B commom stock was raised for the sixth consecutive year, to $1.22 per share.

The New York Times, despite being the third-largest paper in its home city, continues to dominate its rivals, the New York Post and New York Daily News, in advertising, grabbing about a 60% market share and what company executives describe as a 10% profit margin. The New York Times Magazine, which had a 9% decline in ad pages in 1982—primarily because of a fall-off in retail advertising—still managed to rack up a total of 4,114 pages, second among all magazines published in the U.S.

Among the features the paper added in 1982 to attract more advertising were a personal investing special section and "The Sophisticated Traveler," a new Part II of the magazine that carried more than 100 pages of advertising. The editorial achievements of the paper continue to be recognized as well, with the paper picking up two Pulitzer Prizes in 1982 and three others being awarded to Times staffers this year.

The expansion of the regional group of newspapers was a crucial part of the company's operations in 1982. The biggest acquisition was the purchase of the Sarasota (Fla.) Herald-Tribune, a 100,000-circulation paper, making it the company's second largest. The other newly acquired papers, ranging from the Florence (Ala.) Times Tri-Cities Daily to the weekly Kennebunk (Me.) York County Coast Star, have a total circulation of 92,000. The 18 papers that had been part of the regional group for all of 1982 registered a decline of 0.5% in ad linage, but average daily circulation grew 6% to a total of 272,000 copies.

The magazine group earned $23.6 million in 1982, more than double the $13.1 million recorded in 1981, although those earnings were aided by a tax-free gain of $8.4 million from the 1981 sale of company's Australian magazine properties. Family Circle, the largest of the company's magazines, celebrated its 50th anniversary by carrying 1,691 ad pages in 1982, up from 1,661. Family Circle was the only one of the seven "women's books" to show ad pages gains in both 1981 and 1982. Golf Digest and Tennis both maintained the No. 1 position in their fields.

Three broadcast stations, two radio stations and one of the nation's largest cable tv systems make up the company's broadcast/cable group, which had an operating profit of $2.7 million last year, a 20% decline largely attributable to the increased cost of the growing cable system. Since its acquisition in March, 1981, NYT Cable has grown 37% to nearly 100,00 subscribers in the three-county Philadelphia/South New Jersey area. Its ratio of pay-to-basic subscribers is 107%, one of the highest in the industry. Among the company's other operations, an exclusive license to distribute databases produced by the Times Co. has been granted to Mead Data Central. These include the computerized information-retrieval systems previously marketed by the New York Times Information Service. The company has decided to redirect its efforts in this area to electronic journalism and publishing, primarily teletext and videotex.

S.I. Newhouse & Sons

Advance Publications Co., the corporate umbrella for the company otherwise known as S.I. Newhouse & Sons, New York, is the country's seventh largest media company, with media revenues of $1.35 billion in 1982, or 88% of the estimated $1.52 billion it recorded in total revenues.

The media revenues, which cover a string of daily newspapers, Conde Nast magazines and cable operations, were up 8.0% over an estimated $1.25 billion in 1981, or 89% of total revenues that year. The total revenues in 1982, which include Random House books, represented an 8.6% increase over an estimated $1.40 billion in 1981.

Newhouse, the largest privately owned media company in the country, received Federal Communications Commission approval last year for the sale of all its existing radio stations. It sold WAPI (am, fm), Birmingham, Ala., to Bernard Dittman, owner of WABB, Mobile, Ala.; WYSR (am, fm), Syracuse, N.Y., to Katz Communications, and WTPA (fm), Harrisburg, Pa., to Foster Management. Having sold off its tv properties the year before, Newhouse has now reinforced the opinion held by those outside the company that it intends to concentrate on building its empire on publishing and cable/video operations.

Newhouse's cable operations, with more than 700,000 subscribers, is believed to rank eighth among the top 50 multiple system operators owned by newspapers. Its increased involvement with cable and concomitant withdrawal from radio and tv ownership parallels that of the rest of the newspaper publishing business. According to industry figures, newspaper ownership of all tv stations dropped from 42% in 1950 to 30% in 1979. At the same time ownership of am radio stations shows a corresponding drop from 23% to 7%, and ownership of fm stations fell from 37% to

Hitch your wagon to a Telstar

By Mark Liff

When Mutual Broadcasting System hooked up its fortunes to a satellite in 1978, the reaction was less than earthshattering.

"People thought we were out of our minds," says Daniel Flamberg, a Mutual spokesman. "In a sense that is the price you pay. Realistically . . . it was a wild dream, a crazy gimmick. You said satellite dishes to people and they said, 'Ha, ha, ha.' "

Not too many of them are laughing anymore. Perhaps more than any single development, the satellite and its accompanying dishes have become the most influential force of recent times in shaping the course of network radio developments. The major national media companies with radio properties are indeed looking to the heavens for an answer to their problems.

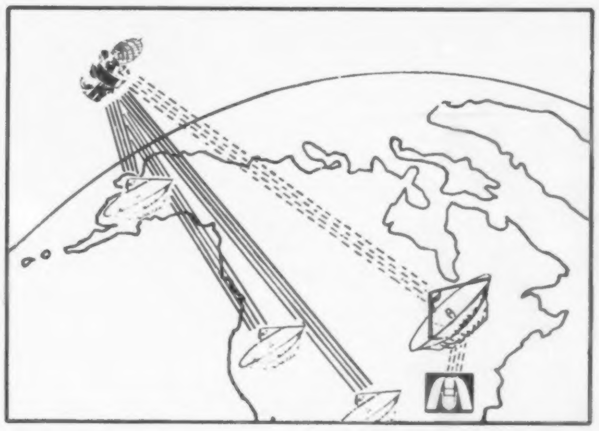
Satellites, when in the right working condition, hover at 22,300 miles over the Equator in either "geosynchronous" or "geostationary" orbit. They appear to be standing still, directly overhead, while in reality they are moving at the same speed as the earth's rotation.

What makes these instruments of technology so valuable is their ability to replace cumbersome mailings of taped programs or telephone hookups, provide live broadcasts of a variety of programs and offer a fidelity heretofore unheard in the world of traditional landline transmission.

In cost-conscious times, satellites also proffer hallowed balance sheet savings in labor and machinery. Fm stations, in particular, have benefited from the advantages satellite transmissions offer.

There is no doubt that the demand for communications satellite access is growing. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration recently estimated that the demand for satellite circuits would increase 10 times by the year 2000.

ABC, CBS, NBC and RKO General, for instance, are moving to take space on the Satcom-I satellite, where signal quality is as good as though you are listening to a concert right in your living room.



These networks represent nearly 3,000 radio stations across the country.

American Broadcasting Cos., for one, is moving its Talk Radio station affiliates to the satellite; plans call for its other affiliate stations, now connected by telephone lines, to move to the satellite.

"We are giving a smorgasbord of programing," says William Battison, ABC vp-planning, finance and satellite development.

ABC's satellite efforts have not come without a hitch, however. About a year ago, the company announced an "indefinite" delay of plans to start "Superadio," a national network connected by satellite. Only six affiliates reportedly had agreed to join the venture.

But ABC did kick off Talk Radio by satellite, using Western Union Telegraph Co.'s Westar-III. The program operates 18 hours a day, Monday through Friday. "It's doing nicely," says Michael Hauptman, an ABC Radio vp.

Additionally, Mr. Hauptman's associate, Mr. Battison, says ABC plans 19 audio channels and one data channel on Satcom-I. The data channel would interface with a line printer so that hard copy would spit out last-minute information on schedules or commercial changes, promotions or other details.

Through satellite communications, Mr. Battison says, "the degradation of signal is negligible to nil." And stations "can simultaneously receive as many channels" as they buy digital decoding cards for.

The signal would be broken into digital impulses and then decoded at the station. Stations would be able to tap into special broadcasts, breaking news events, musical highlights and other options.

ABC, which began its satellite effort in January, now has more than 100 stations on the system. Another 100 stations are installing $10,500 dishes to get ready to join the satellite era, Mr. Battison says.

Mutual Broadcasting, a division of Amway Inc. based in Arlington, Va., began full-scale satellite communications with its more than 900 stations in 1981 after three years of planning with the Western Union. "We designed our satellite system at the time they designed Westar," says Mr. Flamberg. "The two are compatible.

"As a network, we believe it is our responsibility to get the signal to each and every station around the line—and the infrastructure of Ma Bell to take it the last mile was no good. A lot of our stations were getting such a poor quality signal that it discouraged them from staying with the network."

Mr. Flamberg adds, "It was costing us a fortune." He says Mutual spent $500,000 a month for "landline" telephone connections. "And getting the signal to the boondocks was incredibly hard," he adds.

Mutual is also projecting that the technology will help its nonradio operations as well. By 1990, the company says, half its revenues will come from nonbroadcast sources.

Data transmission and specialized networks—including broadcasts for doctors, labor unions or political parties, for example—are logical areas for exploration, the company says.

The examples of ABC and Mutual are hints of the impact satellites are having on the thinking of radio executives. The opportunities, these executives might say, are virtually limitless. ■

Mark Liff is a writer in New York.

8% during that time.

Still, newspapers have begun to express some disenchantment with cable over costs and profitability. And many companies say they are becoming more cautious about expansion plans for the moment. However, over-all newspaper ownership of cable systems continues to increase.

Among Newhouse's newspaper properties—its 28 newspapers are believed to contribute the majority of sales and profits to the company—one folded last year. In September, the afternoon Oregon Journal, Portland, ceased publication, and the company combined the paper's staff with that of the morning Oregonian. The Oregonian has a daily circulation of 237,141 and Sunday circulation of 409,641, the largest in the Pacific Northwest. The Journal had a circulation of about 100,000.

In magazines, the most publicized development at Newhouse last year and into this has been the rebirth of Vanity Fair. Though too new to be evaluated on a financial basis—the first issue had a March, 1983, cover date—the magazine did make news editorially. In April, after developing four issues, Richard Locke was replaced as editor by Leo Lerman of Vogue. And beginning with the May and this month's issue, the magazine made changes in graphics, apparently in response to criticism. Startup costs for the magazine were estimated at $10 million; projections called for 600 ad pages for the first year.

Other Conde Nast magazines, meanwhile, were not entirely immune to the side effects of the tough 1982 economy. House & Garden ad revenues dropped by 14.8% to $22.8 million for the year, according to the Publishers Information Bureau. Ad pages, according to PIB/Leading National Advertisers totals, decreased by 23.3% to 965.46 from 1,258.37 in 1981.

The repositioning of H&G—to a publication with a decidedly affluent tone and appeal—is well under way, and Conde Nast executives have expressed satisfaction with its progress.

Among other Conde Nast magazines, Glamour dipped in ad pages from 2,081.45 in 1981 to 1,885.31 in 1982, but revenues increased 3.4% to $46.9 million from $45.3 million. Both Mademoiselle and Vogue managed only small page gains but did record double-digit increases in revenues. Mademoiselle ad pages increased to 1,525.53 in 1982 from 1,524.15 in 1981, while Vogue pages increased to 2,794.27 from 2,716.03. Revenues for Mademoiselle gained 15.5% to $23.8 million from $20.6 million, while Vogue revenues rose by 11.9% to $45.1 million from $40.3 million.

Ad pages in Bride's also increased in 1982, up 5% to 1,666.64 from 1,586.77 in 1981; ad revenues increased 17.1% to $16.4 million from $14.0 million.

GQ managed a 22.9% increase in revenues, up from $10.5 million in 1981 to $12.9 million in 1982, but had a page gain of only 0.3%, to 1,340.55. Revenues from Self increased 26% to $13.6 million, while ad pages increased 4.1% to 833.28.

For 1983, the company has altered its group buy discounts. The original Conde Nast package has been renamed the Conde Nast Package of Women and now includes Bride's, Glamour, Mademoiselle, Self and Vogue. This package has a circulation of 5.9 million and offers discounts from 6% to 16%, earned on six to 12 or more pages, to advertisers buying equal numbers of pages in four or five magazines a year.

The company has also added a second package, called the Conde Nast Ltd. This package includes Vanity Fair, GQ, House & Garden and Vogue. It offers discounts of 6% to 16% to advertisers who buy equal numbers of pages in three or four magazines over a year.

Also in 1983, Conde Nast plans to expand GQ editorial to give the book less fashion emphasis and more life style focus.

Format switch heats circulation struggle

By Marian Pfrommer

On Thursday, March 10, the loading dock of the San Antonio Express-News came alive with celebration. Bands, beer and two rounds of food fueled the festivities, as employes of Rupert Murdoch's oldest American newspaper holding hailed a record—the Sunday before, Express-News circulation had topped 200,000.

The historic event came just three weeks after the staid Sunday paper had undergone a radical format shift that jolted some conservative staffers and the Express-News' competitor, the San Antonio Light.

Directing this shift was Bert Wise, a 30-year veteran of San Antonio newspapering, who took over as executive editor of News America's morning Express and the Sunday Express-News in mid-February. Formerly managing editor of the flamboyant afternoon News, Mr. Wise immediately jazzed up the conservative Express and the Sunday paper—and boosted Sunday circulation by 7,000 in three weeks.

Under his regime, News formulas are now in place at both the Express and the Sunday Express-News. Stories run shorter, color splashes across the front page, headlines crackle with catchy words. And, reflecting Mr. Wise's belief that readers want community news, local stories get heavy play.

For now, at least, the new format seems to be working. While audited circulation figures are not yet available, Mr. Wise claims the Express now has an average daily circulation of more than 92,000, up 3,000 since he took charge. And the Sunday paper, he says, has jumped from 195,000 to above 202,000 during his short tenure.

Before and after:* Stories in the redesigned San Antonio Express-News run shorter and carry Murdochian headlines, with more emphasis on local news.

While others in the city seem dazed by the sudden circulation spurt, Mr. Wise himself is not surprised.

"I've been watching the Express and the Sunday paper for the last five or six years," he says. "I knew they were on the wrong course, but no one asked me. I knew I could push the Sunday paper over 200,000 and push the Express on toward 100,000."

The course that Mr. Wise considered wrong was in part charted by another key Murdoch staffer, Jim Dolan, who served as managing editor of the Sunday Express-News, then took over as executive editor of the entire operation in January of 1982. While he was in charge, Mr. Dolan ran both papers in a conservative mode, avoiding a vivid use of color, favoring in-depth feature coverage on Sunday and giving prominent play to national and international news in the morning daily.

Under his leadership circulation did rise, but not as drastically as it has since Mr. Wise took command. (Mr. Dolan left the Express-News early this year to supervise Rupert Murdoch's latest media foray, into cable tv.)

Just what will happen in the months ahead is a subject of speculation in this highly competitive market, one of the few in the nation where three daily newspapers still compete.

Even now the circulation battle between the Sunday Express-News and the Light is sparking dispute. The Audit Bureau of Circulations is conducting a special investigation to verify recent circulation figures for all San Antonio papers. This special audit was requested by Express-News publisher Charles O. Kilpatrick after the Light began claiming a Sunday circulation more than 200,000 this spring.

While Mr. Wise believes the audit will refute this claim, Wade Harrington, director of marketing and research at the Light, contends the audit is simply "a delaying tactic."

"They're afraid we're ahead and they want to stop the game for a few minutes," he says.

Whatever the case may be, it's sure that the circulation war in San Antonio will continue to heat up. And, while Mr. Wise believes the circulation gains at the Express-News will continue, his competitors at the Light contend the recent changes will bring only short-term success.

Ironically, it is the Hearst Corp.-owned Light that now maintains the most conservative image in San Antonio. And the paper's leadership is confident that image will ensure victory in the long run.

As Mr. Harrington says, "We feel we're moving in the right direction. We want to look like a responsible big-city daily. We'll let them do their thing and we'll do ours."

For his part, Mr. Wise believes his strategy is the way to win. And he says he's simply following the precedent set by some successful newspapermen of the past. Discussing his tactics, he hearkens back to the lessons he has learned from studying such men as Joseph Pulitzer and James Gordon Bennett.

"I'm not doing anything new," he says. "And Rupert Murdoch hasn't done anything new. Many of the people who founded great newspaper empires did the same things. And all I'm doing is following the history books." ▬

Marian Pfrommer is a writer in San Antonio.

Rupert Murdoch's international News Corporation Ltd., is the country's 31st largest media company, with estimated U.S. revenues of $270.0 million, all in media, for the fiscal 1982, which ended last June 30. In fiscal 1981, U.S. revenues totaled an estimated $210.0 million.

For Mr. Murdoch and News America, the biggest event of the year was the purchase in December of the beleaguered Boston Herald American from Hearst Corp. for $1 million, plus a percentage of future profits.

The ownership change was itself a media event that continued for weeks, filled with tense, sometimes angry, around-the-clock negotiations and battles with union leadership over jobs. Eventually the unions and Mr. Murdoch completed a deal that included a reduction of almost one-third of the paper's staff of 800 and a paring of $4.5 million from annual operating costs. In return, Mr. Murdoch agreed to invest $16 million in the paper in an attempt to revitalize it.

The flamboyant Australian as usual wasted no time. He immediately shortened the tabloid's name to the Boston Herald.

The paper also instituted a promotional cash giveaway, helping to boost circulation, which the Audit Bureau of Circulations placed at about 245,000 in its March audit, an increase of 15% from the March, 1982, figure of 212,000. Sunday circulation, however, dropped to 220,000 from 231,000 a year earlier. Current figures for the rival Boston Globe are 508,000 daily and 779,000 Sunday.

An even bigger disparity exists between the Boston dailies in advertising, where the Herald takes in only about 20% of the market share—an overriding factor in the paper's estimated 1982 loss of $12 million.

Mr. Murdoch's other red-ink American property continues to be the New York Post, which had an estimated pretax loss of $15 million in 1982, according to media analyst John Morton of Lynch, Jones & Ryan in Washington. (Last year, Mr. Murdoch, usually tight-lipped about the finances of his properties, said he expected that the Post would lose some $20 million in a two-year period ending in 1982. Mr. Morton, however, is estimating that the Post could lose $20 million in fiscal 1983 alone.)

On the bright side, Post circulation has continued to climb, with the March ABC figure at 961,000, compared with 904,000 a year earlier. The Post's major competitor, the New York Daily News, also a tabloid, suffered circulation drops during the year, but still is comfortably in the lead, with figures of just over 1.5 million daily and 2 million Sunday. As in Boston, though, the lack of advertising is devastating to the Murdoch paper, as the city's leading retailers continue for the most part to ignore the Post.

Other Murdoch media operations are in the black. New York, which marked its 15th anniversary this spring, ended 1982 with 2,550 ad pages, a 10% increase over 1981, and for fiscal 1983, the weekly projects about $26.5 million in revenue, an increase of 18% over the previous year. (In the first four months of calendar 1983, New York logged 875 pages of advertising as against 713 for the same period in 1982, a 22% increase.)

New York's Village Voice continues to be healthy as well, posting an estimated $1 million profit in fiscal 1982 on estimated revenues of $30 million. The San Antonio papers are locked in a hotly contested battle with Hearst's Light. (See story above.)

The company's national weekly newspaper, The Star, also is profitable, and its Houston community newspapers are estimated to be breaking even.

News America's most recent development was the May announcement that it is entering the direct-broadcast satellite (dbs) tv business. The Murdoch dbs project is a joint venture of News Satellite Television, a British company being formed by Mr. Murdoch's News International and Satellite Television, and Inter-American Satellite Television, Los Angeles.

Donald Kummerfeld, News America president, said that because the dbs provides for only five channels, one presumably would be a 24-hour movie channel while the other four would pick up "the best" that is available from other offerings.

Oak Industries

Oak Industries, Rancho Bernardo, Cal., is the country's 65th largest media company, with estimated revenues of $139.0 million from media operations in 1981, or about 25% of total revenues of $545.7 million. Media revenues in 1981 were an estimated $130.0 million, or about 26% of total revenues of $507.1 million.

Most of Oak's media revenues came from its over-the-air pay tv operations in five markets.

Write-downs (or write-offs) of certain subscription tv developments cut heavily into Oak's 1982 over-all net profit. The company took a pretax charge of $23 million against 1982 earnings, leaving a net income of $4.1 million. For 1981, Oak reported net income of $30.3 million on sales of $507. 1 million.

Up until the middle of 1982 everything was onward and upward for Oak. It has been virtually all downhill since. The catalyst for all the problems has been startup problems with the company's TC-56 addressable decoder, used by cable system operators to build new systems or upgrade existing ones. By Oak's admission, the product was "rushed" through final development, resulting in many performance and quality shortcomings.

But it was as an operator of pay tv systems that Oak became the profile subject of Fortune and got on Wall Street's must-buy list. And it was pay tv, or more specifically Oak's ON TV subscription tv systems, that took a sizable tumble. Oak blamed it on a "faltering" economy. Others said it was the competition from cable and the poor movie product from Hollywood.

Oak reported that disconnects and terminations rose "sharply," especially in the last quarter.

By the end of 1982, Oak's five ON TV systems had an aggregate of 580,000 subscribers, an increase of about 30,000 over the previous year. But the average monthly disconnect rate last year was nearly 5%, compared with a less than 3% rate in 1981.

That spelled trouble and by the first week in May, Oak was forced to end its ON TV over-the-air pay tv operations in Phoenix, Ariz., and Dallas/Fort Worth. The shutdowns, heavily pegged to contractual difficulties the company was experiencing with its stv partners in the two markets, left Oak with three other ON TV operations—in Los Angeles, Chicago and Fort Lauderdale-Miami.

Negative audience response to the scheduling of some of these onetime, special fee programs—the portion of the potential audience that subscribed ranged from 10% to 51% in 1982—has stung the company. As a result, Oak is now being much more careful selecting events and appropriate marketing.

When Oak was riding high, its most promising "acorn" was a plan to construct and operate a direct-to-home broadcast satellite (dbs) system. It was to be a three-phase plan for establishing, by 1994, a dbs system serving the U.S., with 12 channels of pay tv programing to each time zone. The first phase was to begin next year using channels on a Canadian satellite.

In less than a year, most of those ambitions have gone up in smoke. First there was termination of the agreement with the Canadian satellite carrier. More recently, Oak withdrew its application with the Federal Communications Commission for authority to construct and operate a satellite. Still, the company promises to participate in the dbs industry as a system operator, a maker of dbs-related equipment and a provider of dbs programing.

One of Oak's most perplexing problems is a class-action suit filed by shareholders that accuses the company of fraud, deceit and misrepresentation of its financial position in connection with federal and state securities laws. The suit seeks unspecified monetary damages.

Oak dabbled as an owner and operator of cable tv systems, but got out of that business by the fourth quarter of 1982. Systems in Castro Valley and Oxnard, both in California, were sold for a net sales price of about $30.5 million to Cable TV Fund 10-A, an investment group affiliated with Jones Intercable. Now Oak has no further intentions of operating cable systems.

Meanwhile, the good things that have happened to Oak supposedly include a restructuring of the upper level management, completed in January.

As a supplier of pay tv programing, Oak, through a $16 million venture with Universal Pictures (each party funding half of the cost of film production), has released "Psycho II" as the first film in this partnership.

Another more positive development of recent months is Oak's spending of millions to expand its distribution capability through a venture with Telstar Corp. Under the agreement, the programing Oak develops will be marketed via satellite to various pay tv outlets, including other stv systems, satellite master antenna systems, cable tv systems, multipoint distributions systems and low-power tv systems.

This joint venture, which includes the subleasing of transponders from Telstar, began in late February with commitments for 16,000 subscribers. It became the first scrambled, addressable national pay tv service to be broadcast via satellite, and Oak believes it has a "large" potential audience for new programing sales.

Another joint venture was formed with Racal Electronics PLC, an established electronics company in Britain. Oak hopes to develop profit opportunities in pay tv in Europe through this partnership.

Despite these glimmers of hope—the company says that "most heartening" is the technological progress made in solving problems associated with new equipment for cable television—Oak acknowledges that an operating loss for the first and second quarters of 1983 are expected.

Oklahoma Publishing Co.

Oklahoma Publishing Co., Oklahoma City, the nation's 28th largest media company, had estimated media revenues of $302.9 million in 1982, an increase of 13.5% over estimated media revenues of $266.8 million in 1981. The company derives all of its revenues from media operations.

The Daily Oklahoman and Oklahoma City Times continued to dominate corporate revenues, accounting for about 63% of the total. The company's other operations consist of Dallas-based Gaylord Broadcasting Co., the Colorado Springs Sun and the Texas/Oklahoma Farmer-Stockman magazine. Its broadcasting lineup in 1982 consisted of three radio properties and the full complement—as allowed by law—of seven tv stations; however, an agreement was reached recently to sell one station, in New Orleans.

The Oklahoma City newspaper property remained aggressive in the local market, despite the lack of a metropolitan competitor. It pushed up circulation in its morning, afternoon and Sunday papers an average of 4.2% in 1982 over 1981.

The Sunday paper hit 300,358, compared with 286,819 in 1981; the Saturday product, 233,316 (vs. 226,553), and the combined morning and evening papers 280,184 (vs. 266,802), according to Audit Bureau of Circulations figures for the six-month period ending in March.

If there is a problem with circulation, it is the Oklahoma City Times, the evening paper, which increased in circulation only 1%, from 84,198 to 85,004, during the audit period.

Publisher Edward L. Gaylord, speaking on "Oklahoma newspapers: Dinosaurs or Tigers" at a newspaper management seminar in April, sponsored by the Oklahoma Press Assn., identified his own evening Times as "becoming one of the dinosaurs." He said, "We go out trying to get subscriptions for our evening paper and we end up with more for the Daily Oklahoman [the morning paper]. It is just real tough to sell the evening. We used to have 135,000 circulation, and we can't get it back to 90,000." He also told the group, "We might merge the Times into the Oklahoman in the future, but I don't know when. That's been going on in many towns, and I've been trying to hold it off. The Times still makes money, but there is a tremendous duplication of effort and I don't know whether it is worth it anymore."

The paper, which now carries a hefty $63 per inch ($56 per inch in March, 1982) open rate for advertising, thanks to its dominant position in the market, recorded a full-run linage increase of only 0.7% in 1982 over 1981. The combined line count for the a.m. and p.m. dailies dropped 3.8%, from 27.2 million to 26.2 million in 1982. The Sunday linage improvement of 6.5% from 16.9 million to 18.0 million helped bring the year's totals even with 1981's.

Since January, the paper has initiated a number of editorial/advertising moves to perk up advertising, which in February linage reports was down in all papers. It launched "The Look," a monthly fashion section dealing with society stories and fashion trends to court display advertisers who supply models and clothing for the issue covers. It also introduced new Sunday travel and real estate sections and redesigned its entertainment section.

Construction continued on the company's $40 million plant in Oklahoma City, where 20 high-speed, Goss-Metroliner offset presses are being installed. The facility is expected to be in operation this fall.

Since purchasing the morning Colorado Springs Sun in 1977, the company has pumped $20 million into rebuilding the property, but remains in a subordinate position to Freedom Newspapers' Colorado Springs Gazette Telegraph, an all-day paper with 70,000 circulation. The company made one of its biggest moves at the paper in January when it converted to tabloid format. "We gained 5,000 readers during the month," says Mr. Gaylord, who says the company hopes to have 50,000 circulation by September.

Gazette Telegraph officials, however, take exception to his figures, noting that ABC circulation statements for the six months ended March 31 show the Sun with 34,439 daily and 36,375 Sunday. and the Gazette with 87,340 combined daily and 93,009 Sunday. The officials also say linage figures for retail, national and classified from January through the end of May of this year show the Sun down 66,627 inches to the same period a year ago, and the Gazette up 78,275 inches.

"We'll have a showdown with the Hoiles [Freedom Newspapers] papers in the next year or so," Mr. Gaylord said at the management seminar. He believes that two-newspaper towns are a dying breed, which perhaps has something to do with the showdown.

Mr. Gaylord keeps an eye out for promising newspaper properties. The company bid $40 million for the Jackson (Miss.) Clarion-Ledger & News in 1982, but lost out when Gannett Co. more than doubled Opubco's bid for the paper.

Gaylord Broadcasting's lineup of tv stations did not change during 1982. Gaylord came close to selling WVUE-TV in May to New Orleans, reaching a tentative agreement with Dallas-based Belo Corp. on a purchase price of $25 million. However, negotiations broke off soon afterwards.

WVUE is affiliated with ABC and is Gaylord's only nonindependent station. "New Orleans is the smallest town we are in for television," says Mr. Gaylord, although noting "it is a darn good station." It is also a union shop, the only union operation among the tv units owned by Mr. Gaylord, an avid anti-unionist who once flew pressmen from the Oklahoman to Washington to help train pressmen at the Washington Post who were brought in to keep the newspaper open during a strike.

Outlet Co.

Outlet Co., Providence, R.I., is the country's 88th largest media company, with media property revenues of $87 million, a 16% increase from media revenues of $75.0 million in 1981. The revenues were derived from five vhf television and five radio stations.

The publicly owned Outlet became an all media company in 1982 with the sale of its retail segment, which in 1981 had contributed about half of the company's $142.8 million in total revenues.

In early May, Rockefeller Center Inc. announced that it had reached a tentative agreement to acquire Outlet for $68 a share for the company's then outstanding 3.6 million shares. Including the assumption of the company's $87.3 million of debt, the total transaction is being valued at $332.1 million. However, Outlet's WSNE, an fm radio station in Taunton, Mass.-Providence area, would not be part of the sale.

Under the tentative agreement—yet to be ratified by the boards of the two companies, Outlet's shareholders and the Federal Communications Commission—Outlet, would become a wholly owned subsidiary of Rockefeller Center. Bruce G. Sundlun, the president and chief executive officer of Outlet, would become the new unit's chairman and chief executive. David E. Henderson, Outlet's executive vp, would become president and chief operating officer.

All of Outlet's broadcasting units—radio and tv—performed well in 1982, enabling it to post a profit of $18 million on $87 million in revenues. In the previous year, Outlet had a net loss of $18 million.

During the last few years, development and expansion of these broadcast operations have been the keys to Outlet's strategy of growth.

The prime positioning of each of its properties in major broadcasting markets has helped considerably. The company, however, says it has no plans to enter the new communications technologies. Mr. Sundlun, the company's president, has been quoted as saying: "Cable holds no interest for me; it's an obsolescent technology and a limited market at best. I think over-the-air network affiliated television stations will be the major entertainment factor for the rest of this century."

Clearly, it was similar thinking that prompted Rockefeller Center to make its bid for Outlet. The transaction seems to fit into Rockefeller Center's strategy to divest some of its present holdings, predominantly in real estate, and enter into areas that produce higher returns and greater profits. Rockefeller Center's first venture into the entertainment business consisted of a cable tv service called The Entertainment Channel, a joint venture with RCA Corp. The Entertainment Channel was closed last March after it had reportedly lost $34 million before taxes.

Park Broadcasting

Park Broadcasting, Ithaca, N.Y., is the country's 90th largest media company. Net operating revenues from media operations in 1982 were $85.0 million, a 13.3% increase from 1981 revenues of $75.0 million.

Media operations represent 93% of total revenues of $91.0 million in 1982. Total revenues were up 13.8% from $80.0 million in 1981, when media operations accounted for 94% of corporate revenues.

The 21-year-old company has been built through the acquisition of small-market newspapers and broadcast outlets. Maintaining this philosophy, Park last year acquired five new weeklies and two new daily newspapers in small cities in North Carolina and North Dakota. The company last year also folded one of its papers, the Quinton (Okla.) Times.

Roy H. Park, 72, started the company in 1962 with the purchase of WNCT-TV in Greenville, N.C., his home state. Today, Mr. Park, who is the company's sole owner, has seven tv stations, seven am radio and seven fm radio stations. In 1977 the company became the first media concern to own the maximum number of broadcast operations that the Federal Communications Commission allows—seven each of television, am radio and fm radio stations.

Mr. Park has said that the other electronic medium—cable tv—is not the company's style because it is highly capital-intensive and is going to wind up, he believes, in the hands of a few large companies.

Mr. Park began buying newspapers in 1972. Today his company owns 22 dailies and 19 weeklies, many located in the South and Southeast. Newspapers added in 1982 were:

- In North Carolina—Sandhill Citizen, Aberdeen; Sampson Independent, Clinton; Mecklenberg Gazette; Elizabethtown Bladen Journal; McDowell News, Marion, and Robbins Record.
- In North Dakota—Devils Lake Daily Journal.

These latest acquistions fall nicely into the Park fold. The company's policy is to promote growth by reinvesting all company earnings back into the company.

Mr. Park's son, Roy Park Jr., runs another family venture, Park Outdoor Advertising, which operates in Ithaca, Jamestown, Binghamton and Utica, N.Y., and Scranton, Pa.

Penthouse International

Penthouse International, New York, is the country's 57th largest media company, with estimated 1982 media property revenues of $165.0 million, or 94% of total estimated revenues of $175.0 million. In 1981, media revenues were $150.0 million, or 94% of total revenues of $160.0 million.

Last year was one of business as usual, albeit at a somewhat reduced rate, for the empire of Robert Guccione. As top executives attempted to ride out two recessions, one in the national economy and one in the "men's sophisticates" market, developmental activities on a variety of projects continued, but more slowly than originally anticipated. Profits were said to have increased well above those of 1981 because of price increases and the readjustment of arrangements with magazine distributors. But the privately held company, owned by Mr. Guccione and Guccione family trusts, does not make specific figures available.

The focus of the company's pursuits remains magazines, particularly the flagship, Penthouse, which provides an estimated 80% of media property revenues. It seems the company is best at publishing; other ventures, ranging from cable tv to a foray in Atlantic City, remained relatively inactive during the year.

The fortunes of Penthouse, like those of rival Playboy, flagged further during 1982, following the downturns of 1981. Ad pages fell 8.8%, while ad revenues fell 8.5%. Circulation slumped, too, and the rate base guaranteed to advertisers was trimmed to 4 million; by the end of 1982, actual circulation was down to 3.8 million. This decline was stemmed in part by a cover price increase, to $3. This affects Penthouse more than it might other magazines, because 94% of its circulation is in single copies.

But the company is "unwilling to make a judgment based on last year," said David Myerson, executive vp and chief operating officer, "because we think last year was an aberration." He expects circulation and advertising to show signs of growth during the rest of this year; in the second quarter, ad pages for Penthouse rose by 9.3%, their first gain since the first quarter of 1982. The magazine's first "advertorial" section, centering on the 1983 Porsche-Audi line, appeared this month.

Mr. Guccione's other magazines are said to be profitable. Omni, the science monthly, showed a 4.2% gain in ad pages in 1982 over 1981 and an 18.5% gain in ad revenues. Circulation fell slightly, to 769,000, but has since risen to about 825,000, Mr. Myerson said. Ad pages through the first half of 1983 are up 10.2%. Circulation of Forum declined to around 517,000 from 620,000, but Variations has enjoyed a circulation gain to about 250,000 from 200,000. A fifth magazine, a bimonthly called Penthouse Letters, was introduced with a 112-page issue dated April-May, 1983. A half-million copies of the first issue, with a $3 cover price, were distributed.

Meanwhile, the company is pleased with the results of a stepped-up program to license foreign editions. There are two foreign editions of Omni, in Italy and Japan, and seven for Penthouse, in Australia, Brazil, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Spain and West Germany. The Japanese edition, introduced in March, quickly sold out its entire print order of 500,000. Plans are proceeding for creation of a Japanese edition of Forum, Mr. Myerson said.

Being reduced are plans to start a cable tv channel, announced with great fanfare for 1981, then 1982 and later 1983. "Rather than a total commitment," said Mr. Myerson, "we're looking at the market, financing the production of some cable television programs. We'll go into the process step by step."

Indicative of the de-emphasis of cable was the announcement in March of a broadcast syndication project to televise Penthouse's annual Pet of the Year competition. A program of the pageant finals, to be produced by Parkinson-Friendly Productions, is expected to air in early September.

And another area where the company is slowing the pace of its expenditures is films. "Catherine the Great," the second movie in a proposed trilogy—"Caligula" was first—remains in pre-production.

A major drain has been the $522-million libel suit brought by the owners of Rancho La Costa, a California resort alleged in a 1975 Penthouse article to have ties with organized crime. After the magazine was exonerated by a jury in May, 1982, a judge threw out much of the jury's verdict. But that judge's decision is now under review by another judge.

And in the case of a former Miss Wyoming who claimed a 1979 Penthouse article libeled her, a federal appeals court last November overturned a verdict that called for her to be awarded $26.5 million, later reduced to $12.5 million.

The company philosophy remains to "continue . . . embroiling ourselves in controversy," Mr. Myerson said, "because it's important for our readers."

Petersen Publishing Co.

Petersen Publishing Co., Los Angeles, is the country's 74th largest media company, with media revenues of $117.5 million, or 92% of total revenues of $127.5 million. Media revenues were up 12% from 1981's $105.0 million (revised from the $120.0 million Advertising Age reported last year), or 93% of $113.0 million in total revenues.

The privately owned company's media revenues come primarily from its 15 special-interest magazines. It also has interests in real estate, restaurants and art galleries.

While 1982 was a tough year for most publishers, and particularly bad for companies competing in the automotive area, Petersen Publishing put in a robust performance. Company president Frederick Waingrow attributes Petersen's steady gains to the constancy of its readership, hard-core enthusiasts. Sources suggest that Petersen's automotive group continues to be in a strong position, as U.S. auto makers place more emphasis on wooing auto enthusiasts through special-interest media.

So far in 1983, the future looks bright for Petersen. Mr. Waingrow anticipates publishing revenues will reach $133 million this year, with total ad revenues reaching $72.5 million, a significant increase from $63.0 million in 1982.

To date, several titles, including Car Craft, Skin Diver and Motor Trend, are showing all-time records. Mr. Waingrow says that on average total monthly linage for the first five issues of all its titles were up 9.3% from 1982 levels. The largest percentage gains have come from 4 Wheel & Off-Road, Skin Diver and Hunting.

With one exception—Teen—Petersen's magazines reflect the interest of the company's founder and sole owner, Robert Petersen, 56. A former press agent, Mr. Petersen founded the company 35 years ago, with an ambition to develop publications catering to the tastes of auto enthusiasts like himself. The company's first publication was Hot Rod.

From then on, Petersen Publishing was out with other publications reflecting the founder's other interests. While today Mr. Petersen is no longer involved in the day-to-day operations of his company, his stamp is everywhere: Visitors strolling through the hall of the company's seventh-floor executive offices are met by a 1,500-lb. stuffed polar bear encased in glass. A nearby plaque explains that the animal was shot by Mr. Petersen with a .357 magnum.

Since its founding, Petersen Publishing has stuck to a basic strategy that has propelled it to the position as the largest special-interest magazine publisher in the U.S.: It concentrates on narrow market segments and grows through further segmentation in the areas in which it is already entrenched.

In 1982 it didn't deviate from its established course. During the year, it added three new titles in areas in which it already had a presence. In January, it acquired Pick Up, Van & 4 Wheel Drive from CBS Publications. Later in the year, it started two new publications, Circle Track and Dirt Rider, as outgrowths from successsful one-shot magazines produced by its specialty publications division.

In 1983, it plans to start at least two new titles, Sports Car Graphic, a bimonthly covering the technical and racing aspects of sports cars, and Kit Car, a publication devoted to assemble-yourself classic car replicas.

Petersen continues to publish a large number of one-shot magazines issued on a less-than-monthly basis, often just once a year. In 1982 its 49 one-shot titles sold more than 5 million copies on the newsstand, at prices ranging from $2.50 to $6.95. About 60 titles are planned for 1983, including How to Build Off-Road Vehicles, Personal Security, Discover Yourself and Hunting Annual.

Mentioned as possible subjects for single issues are audio-visual equipment, home entertainment and home computers.

Teen is the only Petersen publication run as a separate division. In 1983 it plans to start a new quarterly, Great Looks, a fashion and grooming publication originally introduced in 1982 as a one-shot. Teen, which owns the rights to the Miss Teenage America Pageant, is talking to potential sponsors about bringing the pageant to tv in the fall. Sears, Roebuck & Co. has been the pageant's sponsor in the past.

The company has for the past two years expressed a serious interest in expanding into broadcasting and the new videotechnologies, but has yet to take the step.

Pittway Corp.

Pittway Corp., Northbrook, Ill., is the country's 91st largest media company, with 1982 media property revenues of $81.8 million, down 5.5% from media revenues of $86.3 million in 1981.

Media revenues, which came entirely from Pittway's business press subsidiary, Penton/Industrial Publishing Co., Cleveland, made up 20% of total corporate revenues of $411.1 million in 1982. In 1981, total revenues were $403.6 million, of which 21% came in media.

Publishing ranks behind burglar/fire alarms and packaging in size of contribution to corporate revenues.

Advertising revenues come from 28 magazines, accounted for 75.9% of Penton/IPC's 1982 publishing revenues of $107.8 million. Nonmedia revenue sources contributing to Penton/IPC's total included graphic services (5.2%) and marketing and educational services (18.9%). The company also has real estate holdings that bring its total revenues to $136 million, a figure matched each of the past two years.

Although Pittway Corp.'s total revenues rose 2% from 1981 to $411.1 million, Penton/IPC's share, which includes nonmedia holdings, dropped to 26% in 1982 from 28% the previous year.

Total ad pages for the Penton/IPC's magazines declined 7%, and ad revenues fell 2% from 1981 levels. However, Thomas L. Dempsey, Penton/IPC chairman and chief executive officer (and a Pittway vp), is quick to point out that these decreases follow the company's best year ever and that 1982 results, while below 1981's, are the company's second best in its history.

Ad pages for 1983's first quarter are down compared with the same period in 1982, which Mr. Dempsey characterized as the strongest first quarter ever, but above the total for the fourth quarter of 1982. "The second half of 1982 should be better," he said. "The signs of improvement are beginning to appear."

He is most encouraged about the success of Penton/IPC's newest publication, Computer-Aided Engineering, which began bimonthly publication in February, 1982. "Computers are a hot subject now," he said, "and even though it covers a fairly technical area of the field, the publication still is growing."

Playboy Enterprises

Playboy Enterprises, Chicago, is the 55th largest U.S. media company, with media property revenues of $165.9 million in fiscal 1982, ended June 30, 1982. This amounted to about 79% of total revenues of $210.1 million.

In fiscal 1981, media revenues restated by the company were $177.6 million, or 80% of total corporate revenues of $221.5 million, a figure restated by the company from $388.9 million.

The publicly held company lost $51.7 million in 1982, although profits from media operations were $7.6 million. Nonmedia revenues came from Playboy Clubs and other interests.

The corporate figures for 1981 have been restated by Playboy to reflect only continuing operations. In fiscal 1982, the company withdrew from one of its primary business areas—casino gaming. Two adverse regulatory decisions led Playboy to discontinue its gaming operations in the United Kingdom and its casino in Atlantic City. It then divested itself of several unprofitable businesses, including resort hotels and book publishing.

Anointed to oversee Playboy's transformation into a slimmed-down company whose basic business is communications was Christie Hefner, the 30-year-old daughter of Playboy founder and chairman Hugh Hefner.

With the company in various capacities for seven years, Ms. Hefner took the title of president from Derick J. Daniels, who resigned in May, 1982.

Even as the company became more dependent on the publishing business, Playboy magazine—a mature book in a mature category—continued to lose ground in advertising and circulation.

The magazine's rate base was lowered to 4.4 million from 5 million in January, 1983. Ad pages were down 30.8% in the first quarter of 1983, after a 12.1% drop in 1982. Ad revenue fell 3% last year, and rates were slashed 12% in January.

One of Ms. Hefner's favorite projects, the Playboy Guides, was killed in the spring of 1983, less than a month after the company announced it would increase the frequency of one of them—Playboy Fashion—to quarterly from semiannually.

Launched in 1980, the Guides were sent free to Playboy subscribers and sold on newsstands. According to Nat Lehrman, president of the publishing division, they will reappear as special sections of Playboy by the end of the year or early 1984. Although Mr. Lehrman acknowledges the Guides were losing money, he said the discontinuation "is part of a plan to position Playboy as the preeminent men's life style magazine."

In the video arena, the Escapade/Playboy pay cable tv network officially became the Playboy Channel in November, 1982, as the company took 100% control of programing for the network of which it is half owner—the other half is owned by Rainbow Programming Services Co.

With 400,000 subscribers, the Playboy Channel was making about $10 million annually by the end of 1982. The company expects 750,000 subscribers by the end of calendar 1983.

Providence Journal Co.

Providence Journal Co., Providence, R.I., is the nation's 66th largest media company, with 1982 revenues from media operations of $132 million, or 42% of $312.0 million in total revenues. In 1981, the company had media revenues of $121.0 million, or 46% of $262.0 million in total revenues.

The media operations of the company consist of two daily newspapers, radio and tv properties and cable tv systems. It derives nonmedia revenues from its Providence Gravure subsidiary.

Last year, the U.S. circuit court of appeals in Boston ruled that the Providence Journal had violated antitrust laws by refusing to accept advertising from an apartment and rental home referral service. According to the newspaper, it had banned the category of advertising after it had been deluged with complaints about another referral service advertiser's allegedly deceptive practices.

The issues in the case have led the American Newspaper Publishers Assn. to join the Journal in seeking a Supreme Court reversal.

The broadcasting operations of the company continue to consist of the operations of one tv station and two radio stations. Providence Journal Broadcasting, a wholly owned subsidiary, operates WPHL-TV in Philadelphia and WEAN (am) and WPJB (fm) in Providence.

The company has established itself as a major force in cable tv through its ownership of Colony Communications, the 30th ranked multiple system operator (mso) in the country. It has 165,000 basic subscribers and 160,000 who subscribe to pay services. The company also operates a multipoint distribution system (mds) that transmits Home Box Office programing to nearly 17,000 subscribers in Boston, Springfield, Mass., and Providence. The number of mds subscribers last year was 21,000.

Colony this month began distributing Cableview, an 80-page magazine format monthly, to approximately 110,000 Colony subscribers. The subscribers had been receiving a variety of program guides put out by the program suppliers.

Amidst all this, the company has been substantially involved in adding new cable systems and selling off others. It sold off systems covering six communities in the Pittsburgh area and is selling its franchises in Falmouth, Mass., and Bennington, Vt. At the same time, a joint venture of Colony, Copley Newspapers, and local investors won the first negotiating rights to the 8,100-home Lomita, Cal., franchise. The Lomita franchise is adjacent to Colony's systems in the Harbor City, San Pedro and Wilmington sections of Los Angeles. With the winning of Lomita, Colony will have more than 37,000 subscribers in four contiguous communities. The mso was also the successful applicant in a 7,500-home section of an unincorporated section of Los Angeles.

Last June, Colony began to publish two 24-hour electronic newspapers using a Canadian videotex technology. Both systems are off and running and are available to all Colony subscribers in the Providence-New Bedford, Conn., areas.

Colony has also begun to develop institutional cable links for a number of corporate clients, including International Business Machines Corp., Wang Laboratories and the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institute. The institutional systems are fully operational, said Mal White, Colony's director of public relations.

In addition, the company also established a division of broadcast sales to pursue the possibility of cable advertising. The division sells time on advertiser-supported channels, as well as on some locally produced ones. In 1982, revenues of this unit had more than doubled to $2.2 million.

Pulitzer Publishing Co.

Pulitzer Publishing Co., St. Louis, is the country's 43rd largest media company, with 1982 revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE at $224 million, all from media sources. In 1981, media revenues in the privately owned company—the majority of stock is held by members of the Pulitzer family—were an estimated $197.4 million.

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the company's largest property and its flagship operation, weathered the recession of 1982 in surprisingly good shape, partly because of a salary freeze and other labor reduction measures put into place in 1981. A drop in the price of newsprint also helped maintain financial health.

During the first three months of 1983, Pulitzer Publishing took several steps to change its broadcast property lineup. First it sold its Providence, R.I., station, WLNE-TV, a CBS affiliate, to Freedom Newspapers of Santa Ana, Cal., for a reported $15.5 million.

That move paved the way for completion of a larger transaction with Multimedia Inc., Greenville, S.C. Pulitzer traded KSDK-TV in St. Louis for Multimedia's WFBC (renamed WYFF) in Greenville and WXII in Winston-Salem, N.C. The transaction also involved about $8.5 million in cash. All three stations are NBC affiliates.

Both companies had wanted to divest themselves of their hometown tv properties because the Federal Communications Commission frowns upon cross-ownership of dailies and tv stations in the same market. Pulitzer also wanted to lessen its dependence on the St. Louis market. In addition, Pulitzer now intends to buy two uhf stations—WPTA in Fort Wayne, Ind., and WKLY in Louisville, Ky.—from the Gannett Co., pending FCC approval.

Those acquisitions would bring Pulitzer to the FCC limit of five vhf stations and two uhf stations, and the company says it plans no further changes in the roster.

The shuffle of properties would leave Pulitzer without an anchor in a major metropolitan area, but the company apparently prefers less-crowded, midsize markets such as Greenville and Fort Wayne. "We're comfortable with that size station," said Nicholas G. Penniman IV, Pulitzer's assistant general manager.

While many publishing companies have diversified into cable ownership, Pulitzer hasn't and probably won't. "We've stayed away from cable systems and will continue to," Mr. Penniman said.

However, the company has a subsidiary, Pulitzer Productions, which has experimented with electronic information distribution and in December it purchased 80% ownership in a tiny entrepreneurial concern that could eventually produce high school sports programing for cable.

Pulitzer Productions bought half-interest in another venture, States News Service, Washington, last year, but closed the operation in March. Officials blamed the economy.

St. Louis' two daily newspapers, Pulitzer's afternoon Post-Dispatch and the morning Globe-Democrat, which is owned by Newhouse Newspapers, merged all operating functions, except editorial, under a newspaper agency agreement in 1979. Since then, the two papers have split profits and losses equally.

Pulitzer management controls the operating agency and handles all accounting, circulation and advertising for both papers. The Post-Distpatch and Globe have a combined daily circulation of about 500,000 and weekend circulation of about 700,000.

The newspaper agency lost money or was only marginally profitable from 1979 through 1981, but thanks to cost-cutting measures instituted before the recession, it apparently did well in 1982.

The supplement, born as an advertising-only package, evolved into a Globe-Democrat section called "Living Midweek" containing editorial copy, run-of-press advertising and inserts.

"Living Midweek" is dropped on some 500,000 doorsteps in the St. Louis area, and it's designed to compete directly with the Suburban Newspapers of Greater St. Louis.

While taking on the suburban weeklies at the grass-roots level, the Post-Dispatch and Globe also find themselves challenged at the other end of the spectrum by USA Today, Gannett Co.'s national daily, which came to St. Louis in April.

The Post-Dispatch is responding by redesigning its vending machines, planning a new promotion and brightening its graphics, typography and page-one layout. (The Globe, with early morning deliveries and sales, is said to be less vulnerable.)

"We have 10% to 15% national advertising, and we're competing directly with USA Today for that," Mr. Penniman said.

Then, too, in most markets USA Today is believed to take away 3% to 5% of local street sales, "but we're not going to let them have it here," he said, "at least not without a fight."

RCA Corp.

RCA Corp., New York, is the fourth largest media company, with media revenues totaling $1.79 billion in 1982—all from National Broadcasting Co. The media revenues represented 22% of the corporation's total 1982 revenues of $8.24 billion. In 1981, RCA reported $1.62 billion in media revenues, or 20% of total revenues of $8.01 billion.

The year 1982 marked not only a 10% advance in NBC's sales over 1981, but the end of a four-year earnings slide. NBC reported pretax profits at $107.9 million in 1982, up from $48.1 million. For the first quarter of 1983, RCA reported over-all sales had risen to $2.09 billion from $1.97 billion in the first quarter of 1982. Net income, however, fell to $32.3 million from $60.5 million.

NBC's performance was not broken out in the quarterly statement, other than a note that NBC posted "sharply higher" profits on a 24% increase in first-quarter sales, thanks to the tv network's Super Bowl ad sales, the impact on prime time sales that its improved demographic ratings were having and cost control measures. Strong sales at the owned-and-operated tv stations group were also reported.

At the end of the 1982-83 prime time season, A.C. Nielsen Co. measurements showed NBC with an average 15.1 homes rating, 2.6 points behind No. 2 ABC and 3.1 points behind leader CBS. While the network remained the prime time also-ran, NBC executives indicated they were pleased at having held even with the 15.1 average in the 1981-82 tv season, while ABC dipped 2% from an 18.1 average and CBS fell 4% from 18.9.

NBC's highest-rated series of the season turned out to be "The A Team," a midseason entry that managed to break ABC's hold on Tuesday nights. That was followed by "Hill Street Blues," "Little House: A New Beginning," "Real People" and "Facts of Life." NBC, however, had 14 of the 30 lowest-rated shows of the season.

As part of the trend toward more made-for-tv movies on network tv—pay cable is undercutting the appeal of the theatricals—NBC last season had seven tv movies that cracked the 30-share mark, tying ABC; CBS had 14 such tv films. Like the other networks, NBC has fared well with miniseries, and more are due next season

NBC has also been faring well in late night and Saturday morning children's time periods, but it has been facing difficult competition in daytime, early morning and evening news.

With its Tom Brokaw/Roger Mudd anchor team, the network for the first time lost its second-place berth in the evening news averages for the 29-week span ending April 17. Its 11.6 share put it five-tenths of a point behind ABC's newscast. (NBC News presented 3,100 or so hours of tv and radio programing last year.)

But thanks to "Smurfs," "Shirt Tales" and "Amazing Spider Man/Incredible Hulk" cartoons, NBC easily dominated Saturday mornings this past season—its first win in eight years; ABC was second, and CBS was in the unusual position of also-ran.

The 30-year-old "Today," the onetime early morning leader, has trailed ABC's "Good Morning America" for well over a year in the ratings. Now, CBS' "Morning News" has begun gaining, averaging a 3.6 rating and 16 share for the second quarter (from March 21 through April 24), compared with "Today's" 4.0 rating and 18 share.

The network, meanwhile, started two news-oriented shows last year, "Early Today" and "NBC Overnight."

In daytime, NBC's schedule has been hovering in the 4 and 5 rating range, compared with roughly 7 for its rivals.

Grant Tinker, chairman of NBC since mid-1981, and Brandon Tartikoff, NBC Entertainment president, have been leaning toward greater stability in prime time, with fewer abrupt schedule adjustments and more early renewals for series that have promising demographic numbers, if not always hot overall household Nielsens. Examples of such early renewals for 1983-84 include "Cheers," "Silver Spoons" and "Knight Rider."

One segment of the network's offerings helped brighten the picture a bit. Of the three weeks of 29 that NBC managed to capture in the ratings, two came because of the network's sports coverage: The World Series coverage last October and the Super Bowl telecast of last January.

Meanwhile, the NBC-TV Stations division reported its 11th consecutive year of sales growth in 1982 and its third straight year of record profits.

NBC Radio's sales climbed 14% last year, but startup costs for new operations caused a decline in earnings. Like the other major radio networks, NBC said it plans to convert to satellite transmission completely "by the end of 1983."

NBC's veteran radio network, at the end of May, boasted 380 affiliates, while The Source—aimed at the young adult segment—has 168 and Talknet has 135 stations.

RCA, which claimed sales leadership in the sale of videocassette hardware and SelectaVision videodisc hardware and software, widened its horizons last year via three home video ventures, two involving prerecorded videocassette programing in the domestic (U.S. and Canada) and global markets and one in pay cable. The vcr ventures—known as RCA/Columbia Pictures Home Video in North America and RCA/Columbia Pictures International Video abroad—involve a partnership with Columbia Pictures Industries. While the vcr and disc programing do not contain commercial messages thus far, various industry experts predict that this is a strong possibility.

RCA held a 50% interest in The Entertainment Channel, a pay cable service that operated at a loss last year and folded early this year, with only 50,000 subscriber homes. It had a programing identity problem in the cable industry, and a $34 million pretax loss to show for its nine months of effort. Although the service, in which Arthur Taylor (onetime CBS Inc. president) and Rockefeller Center Inc. were partners, was announced for eventual return as an ad-supported service, industry sources said that is unlikely to occur.

Reader's Digest Assn.

Reader's Digest Assn., Pleasantville, N.Y., is the country's 36th largest media company, with 1982 media property revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE at $256.0 million, down 4% from AA's revised estimate of $267.0 million for 1981.

In 1982, media revenues represented 20% of $1.3 billion in total corporate revenues, compared with 22% of $1.2 billion in 1981.

Last year's U.S. media revenues came from the U.S. edition of Reader's Digest, six issues of the now-defunct Families magazine and from Source Telecomputing, an electronic information service for personal computer users. Reader's Digest is estimated to have provided $250 million of U.S. media revenues, or 97% of the company's total domestic media revenues.

RDA, whose voting stock is owned entirely by Lila Wallace, widow of Digest founder DeWitt Wallace, also derives revenues from foreign editions of the Digest, the publishing of books and educational materials and mail-order sales of recorded music and other products. Among the company's important new revenue sources is "The Reader's Digest Bible," which the company says has sold "extremely well."

Last November's Digest set a magazine industry record for a single issue, with $13.2 million in ad revenues, breaking the mark set by the Digest's December, 1981, issue. The longer range results, for 1982 as well as the last several years, have been less encouraging. The magazine's ad revenues last year fell 7.1% to $104.9 million, causing the Digest to drop to No. 9 from No. 7 among all U.S. magazines in ad revenues, according to the Publishers Information Bureau.

Ad pages dropped 14% to 1,093 from 1,271. Last year's ad page total was down 27% from 1,502 pages five years ago—the most ever for the publication—and was the Digest's smallest number of ad pages since 1975.

The Digest was given a big boost by a 40-page Chrysler advertising section in the May, 1983, issue, which is believed to be one of the two largest ad sections in the magazine's history. Nonetheless, the magazine's ad revenues through May were $40.1 million, down 6.4% from the same period in 1982. Ad pages, including the Chrysler pages, totaled 409, down 8.9%. The 1983 figures are publisher's estimates provided by RDA.

Richard McLoughlin, Digest publisher, said ad pages may be up slightly for the year. Lynn Mapes, ad director, estimated that each issue in the second half of the year will have more pages than the corresponding year-ago issue.

To offset the recent decline in pages, the Digest, like other magazines, has been increasing ad rates. The Digest gets more for a page of advertising than any other magazine, and with its January, 1983, issue it became the first magazine to break the $100,000 level for a four-color full-page ad, raising its rate 6% to $103,600 from $97,700.

U.S. circulation of the Digest appears to have peaked—by design because of the cost of additional circulation, magazine officials suggest—at 17.9 million, the largest of any U.S. magazine. Its guaranteed circulation to advertisers has remained unchanged at 17.75 million for years.

Its "Tulsa is driving the networks nuts" ad campaign, launched early this year, is one of the magazine industry's more vigorous efforts to capitalize on the falloff in network tv viewership. The campaign is based on a study showing that in Tulsa, Okla., which RDA says is both representative and predictive, magazine readership—unlike network tv viewing—holds steady despite the increased availability of cable tv. Mr. Mapes said Digest readership actually increased a bit in Tulsa, according to a follow-up study commissioned by the magazine.

An RDA spokesman said it wasn't possible to determine how many advertisers have turned to the Digest specifically because of its Tulsa campaign, but he said the Digest has received more than 500 requests for the study from agency and advertiser people "at decision-making levels."

Increasing the Digest's ad-drawing power may constitute the bulk of RDA's near-term aggressiveness in magazines. Some industry observers believe that what other plans it may have had in magazines were dealt a serious blow—as was the company's pride and confidence—by the failure of Families, the company's first new U.S. magazine.

In the euphoric Families test period, company officials hinted that a successful Families might lead to a number of other new magazines. Having to scrap Families last June after just nine issues because of low readership may have made the company gun-shy about other start-ups, some speculate.

Mr. McLoughlin said it isn't so. "There's absolutely no thought in this company that we will not add additional magazines to the stable," he said.

For the moment, however, most of RDA's new-media interest seems to be in the electronic area. After a long search, its Source videotex subsidiary found an outside company to add both money and technological expertise to the struggling operation.

Two months ago, Minneapolis-based Control Data Corp. agreed to invest an undisclosed amount in Source in return for two of the venture's five directorships and a share of the profits, when and if they materialize. RDA retains controlling interest in the McLean, Va., unit, which it acquired in 1980, a year after Source was founded.

According to one published report, which RDA will not comment on, Source lost $5 million to $7 million on revenues of just $6 million to $8 million in the fiscal year that ended last July 31. At that time, the company had about 25,000 subscribers. It also had gone through a management shakeup that saw George V. Grune take over as chief executive in addition to his existing duties as RDA vp-condensed and general books and recorded music.

At the time of the Control Data investment, Source had 33,000 subscribers and was adding about 2,500 a month, according to RDA. A new computer center that gives Source a capacity of 250,000 users was opened last October. An RDA spokesman said the company expects Source to reach profitability during 1984.

In another foray into a new area, RDA early this year formed a subsidiary, Reader's Digest Entertainment, to produce tv programing. As of last month, the new unit had three productions in the works.

A novel life for an NBC executive

By Larry Doyle

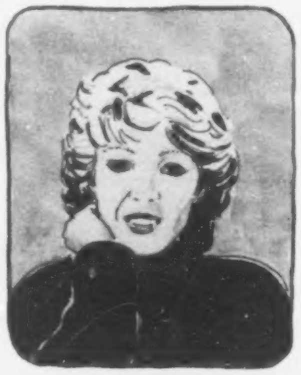
If the life of Ann Berk, vp-advertising, publicity and promotion with NBC-TV Network, were a novel, the dust jacket might read: "Outwardly, she is the ideal New Woman. She seems to juggle the demands of a career, a child, a lover, a home with ease. . . . Young enough to have caught the wave of the women's movement and ridden it to success as a television executive, Ann is drawn by a deeper, older and conflicting summons, the instinct to nurture."

Ann has been changed to Diana, but otherwise, that is exactly what it says on the inside cover of Ms. Berk's first novel. "Fast Forward," she says, "is fiction, but the major character is very, very much like me in the way she thinks and feels and reacts."

Ms. Berk is something of a modern marvel herself. From leaving an agency in the early 1960s to work as copywriter for NBC Radio Network—"I prefered writing about people and not products," she says—to taking two years out of her career in the 1970s to have a child, Ms. Berk has managed nonetheless to hopscotch to the top of her field.

Until a month ago, Ms. Berk was the station manager for WRC-TV in Washington; she left that position to become vp-advertising, promotion and publicity for the entire NBC-TV Network. It would not be an unusual career if she were a man; it is unique because she is a woman.

Yet Ms. Berk resists efforts to categorize her as a "symbol" of the women's movement. Her success in advertising and broadcasting is a result of "a lot of hard work, a lot of creativity and a lot of hours;" it is not something she accomplished in spite of being a woman.



Berk: Writing becomes a thing you cannot not do.

This is an exciting, a hectic, a joggling time for Ms. Berk. With her first book being published by Doubleday this month, she also is trying to settle into her new NBC position, is moving child, dog, cat and caboodle to New York and is searching for the right school for her 12-year-old daughter, Melinda.

Up until a month ago, she held a second job as well, remaining as station manager of WRC-TV until a replacement for her could be found.

As a single parent and network executive, Ms. Berk is finding the transition difficult. "If I were a man," she says, "I would have a wife to take care of all the details. As it is, it's just me and my daughter."

Yet she manages. And her secret to success is a relatively simple one: "I don't know," she says.

"I honestly don't know how it all gets done."

This idea is central to Ms. Berk's philosophy, it seems, that the demands of a career and home on a working woman create a situation that would be called impossible if not for the fact it existed. Women who pursue careers but at the same time are unable or unwilling to give up their home lives, "end up with this wildly expanded list of priorities where everything is of equal importance, forcing them to perform a balancing act just to keep their lives together," she says.

"Fast Forward" acts this out as fiction, but it is not the first time Ms. Berk has expressed these feelings.

In September, 1980, while the first female station manager of a network-owned tv station and consequently one of the more successful career women of her generation, she wondered in a Newsweek "My Turn" column if the early feminists knew what they were getting her into.

The "Modern Woman's Double Life" article in Newsweek came about, Ms. Berk says, "out of frustration. I had been reading so many articles about what it was like to be the modern marvel, the new woman, and every time I read them I didn't relate to them, my reaction was, 'That's not it at all.' "

Her readers apparently agreed, and Ms. Berk says she got more than 1,000 letters in response to the Newsweek article and phone calls from all over the country. "One of the phone calls," she says, "was from a literary agent who was on an airplane, read the article, and said, 'Wait a minute, this woman's a writer. Nobody has said this about women. This could be a novel.' "

Thus encouraged, Ms. Berk produced the first 50 pages of a novel, which her agent brought to Kate Medina, an executive editor at Doubleday. "We gave her a contract based on that," Ms. Medina says, "which is something we hardly ever do."

Having a contract for a novel, of course, only further complicated Ms. Berk's life. She could not be a night writer as many aspiring novelists are, because "I'm a single parent and when I come home after work I want to spend time, I need to spend time with my daughter." Instead, she says, "what I've been doing is writing on weekends, getting up very, very early in the morning and writing at seven hours a stretch."

Ms. Berk says she plans to continue this routine when she moves to New York. She is already working on a second novel.

And why, in the face of one of the more demanding jobs in advertising—promoting and publicizing NBC—and moving to a new locale with a daughter verging on adolescence, would Ms. Berk continue to add writing to her juggling agenda?

Her answer for that is simple, too, "After a while," she says, "It becomes a thing you cannot not do."

Rodale Press

Rodale Press, Emmaus, Pa., the nation's 100th largest media company, had media revenues of $67.0 million in fiscal 1982, which ended July 31. That represented 70% of the company's total revenues of $96.0 million for the year and reflected a hefty 22% increase over the $55.0 million in media revenues recorded in 1982, when media operations accounted for 65% of $85.0 million in total revenues.

For fiscal 1983, Rodale expects to top the $100 million mark in total revenues.

Among its nonmedia operations, Rodale's book publishing division reported $28 million in revenue in fiscal 1982, down $1 million from 1981, while miscellaneous revenue remained around the $1 million level.

The privately owned company, founded more than four decades ago by the late J.I. Rodale, continues to place its publishing emphasis on health and well being.

Rodale's publications include the firmly entrenched Prevention, reportedly the largest health magazine in the world, with circulation now up to 2.5 million. A full-color health and beauty section was added to Prevention in September.

Organic Gardening, devoted chiefly to ways to grow foods naturally and process them as well, retained a 1.35 million circulation mark. Bicycle buffs now have a choice of two Rodale-owned publications, Bicycling and the newly launched "Bike Tech" newsletter.

Bicycling, which addresses the industry and consumers through articles ranging from repair to pleasures of cycling, now also serves the readers of American Cyclist, a beginner-oriented publication purchased by Bicycling in late 1982. Bicycling, published nine times yearly, closed a record April issue, which featured 114 advertising pages among a total of 208 pages.

"Bike Tech," which made its debut last June as a Bicycling spinoff, deals with more technical coverage of the industry.

New Shelter, Rodale's magazine for do-it-yourselfers and home improvement specialists, recently increased its rate base to 650,000, nearly triple the circlation it reported when it was initiated in 1980.

Another large circulation jump involved Spring, Rodale's women's service magazine, which had a kickoff run of 250,000 with its first issue in April, 1982, and claimed 400,000 circulation by October.

However, in late 1982 Rodale dropped plans to make Spring a monthly, choosing a nine-times-a-year cycle instead.

Noting that Rodale does not accept tobacco and alcoholic beverage advertising, the company doubles up on those months in which liquor and tobacco provide other books with substantial advertising. This nine-time frequency is the same as our quite successful New Shelter and Bicycling."

Other Rodale publications include New Farm, an agriculturally oriented magazine, and "Executive Fitness Newsletter" and "Body Bulletin," aimed at executives and employers.

Once limited almost exclusively to subscriptions, some Rodale magazines now are distributed through single-copy sales.

Circulation growth for the company's publications remains "very healthy," says Sandy Beldon, group vp of Rodale Press. "Even in the light of a downtrend in the economy, media buyers tend to look for efficiencies, and our magazines offer such efficiencies."

The book publishing division continues to market from 35 to 40 books annually. In the electronic publishing division, a Rodale-produced "Home Dynamics" series was licensed this year to Cable Health Network.

Rodale also was a participant in Knight-Ridder Newspapers' videotex testing and plans to provide information for K-R's videotex launch this year in Miami.

Rogers-UA Cablesystems

Rogers-UA Cablesystems, Westport, Conn., is the nation's 78th largest media company, with 1982 revenues of $107.0 million and operating profit of $38.0 million, all in cable operations, compared with revenues of $77.8 million and operating profit of $26.7 million in 1981.

While the company added no new cable franchises during 1982, its subscriber base rose to 630,000 from 569,000 in 1981, ranking Rogers-UA as the ninth largest multiple system cable operator in the U.S.

Only six months after the company became a joint venture of Rogers Cablesystems of Toronto and United Artist Theater Circuit (UATC) Nov. 19, both parent companies have agreed in principle to sever the partnership and divide the assets of Rogers-UA. Final resolution of the splitting of assets is expected sometime this August.

Robert Rosencrans, president of Rogers-UA, said the two parent companies, after working with each other, discovered they each had different objectives and that the partnership "just didn't mesh."

The dissolving of the current joint venture is the latest chapter in the brief but stormy history of the company. Last year, UATC, UA-Columbia's largest shareholder, fended off repeated takeover attempts by a group led by Dow Jones & Co. and Knight-Ridder Newspapers. UA-Columbia at first approved a $265 million takeover offer from Dow Jones-Knight Ridder, only to have that decision reversed by UATC last June. UATC then formed its joint venture with Rogers Cablesystems, with UATC paying an additional $63 million to increase its holdings in the company to 49%. Rogers Cablesystems, the largest cable operator in Canada, paid $152 million for 51% of the joint venture stock.

The pending corporate divorce was caused in part at least by the financial troubles of the Rogers parent company. Rogers Cablevision operations in 1982 resulted in a loss of $13.3 million, while losses for the first half of the current fiscal year, ended Feb. 28, were $7.8 million.

Nevertheless, the Toronto-based parent company expected revenues during this fiscal year to reach $340 million, compared with $244.4 million in last fiscal year. Prospects looked good for the company, however, in its marketing of pay cable services, new to Canada this year. Graham Savage, vp-financial planning with Rogers, said recently in a speech before Canadian financial analysts in Toronto that the company expects at least 40% pay subscription penetration in its basic cable subscriber base of 1.4 million. Rogers is now preparing a proposed division of assets with UATC on the Rogers-UA properties.

Rollins Inc.

Rollins Inc., Atlanta, is the nation's 97th largest media company, with media property revenues of $69.2 million in 1982, or 13% of $526.5 million in total revenues. This represented an 11% increase over the $62.1 million in media revenues the company recorded in 1981, when media operations accounted for 14% of $454.6 million in total revenues. Over that period, media operations maintained operating profit margins at 29%, with operating income increasing by 10% to $20.1 million.

The publicly owned company's primary business is termite and pest control, but it has diversified to include services to oil and gas fields and burglar protection for homes, as well as media ownership. The media operations comprise cable systems in a four-state area, outdoor advertising facilities in the Northeast and the Southwest, three vhf television stations, one fm radio station and five am radio stations.

During the last year, the company expanded its cable tv franchises to cover 25 communities in Delaware, Connecticut, Massachusetts and Rhode Island. With a total of 134,000 basic subscribers, Rollins ranks as the 35th-largest multiple system operator (mso) in the nation. Its Wilmington, Del., franchise, with 73,000 basic subscribers, ranks as the 25th-largest cable system.

The company said it has filed for additional cable franchises in Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Pennsylvania and that other applications are being contemplated.

In January, Rollins was among the many companies that bid for Philadelphia's four franchises of 155,000 homes each at the urging of the city council.

The contest for the Philadelphia franchises is not going to be simple for Rollins. Financial statements made by Rollins about its debt capital and capital expenditures are inconsistent.

On the programing front, Rollins has captured the fancy of the industry with its recent experiment in Wilmington, where it has asked its subscribers to cast a vote for the programing service they would like to see the most.

The company will provide a ballot with 10 possible choices to its subscribers in the May bill and will ask them to choose one of the services.

While a number of the companies participating in the ballot are skeptical of the subscribers' ability to make the proper choice, Rollins is confident about the outcome.

Quite apart from cable are the company's radio and tv stations. Stations WPTZ, Plattsburgh, N.Y./Burlington Vt. (an NBC affiliate), and WEAR, Mobile, Ala./Pensacola, Fla. (ABC), both showed increased revenues. In the process they also expanded their local sales staff.

By contrast the radio properties instituted exhaustive expense reduction programs in order to improve productivity during fiscal 1982.

Sammons Communications

Sammons Communications, Dallas, is the nation's 93rd largest media company, with revenues in 1982 of $81.0 million, all in media. This represented an increase of 35% from the $59.9 million in revenues recorded in 1981. The company is a wholly owned subsidiary of the privately owned Sammons Enterprise.

Nearly all of Sammons' revenues come from the operation of its cable systems. While it does operate the Sammons Information Service for the marketing of Dow Jones & Co.'s information service to its many cable subscribers, as well as Sammons Productions for the creation of programing for pay, the revenues from both these units have been minimal, said Jim Roseen, a company spokesman.

Sammons is the nation's 13th largest multiple system operator, with systems in 21 states. At last count, it had 543,321 basic subscribers. Of these, nearly 360,000 also subscribed to pay services. Sammons' basic subscribers as a percentage of total homes passed by cable is one of the highest for all cable operators in the country. However, it ranks low in the list of pay subscribers as a percentage of homes passed.

One large franchise, Fort Worth, Tex., in which Sammons has a 60% interest, continues to undergo construction. Sammons and 14 local investors won the 160,000-home franchise in 1981, and parts of it have been completed.

The company said it already has 23,000 basic subscribers and expects to add another 50,000 in the coming years.

Although many of the major companies have continued to expand through aggressive franchising or acquisitions, Sammons has been relatively inactive in 1982. Both its basic and pay subscriber count increased during the year, but the company did not add any new systems.

However, the company continues to be in the market for acquisitions. "If the right one came along we'd go for it," Mr. Roseen said.

Last year, the company entertained extensive plans for the development of its production unit and its marketing unit for information services. However, the plans have since been given a lower priority.

E.W. Scripps Co.

E.W. Scripps Co., Cincinnati, is the 18th largest U.S. media company, with 1982 media revenues of $575.0 million, or 91% of of $631.9 million in total revenues. In 1981, media revenues were $500.0 million, also 91% of total revenues of $550.0 million. Both revenue figures respresented a 15% increase over 1981.

All figures for the privately held company, most of which is owned by the Scripps family trust, are estimated by ADVERTISING AGE. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting of Cleveland—listed separately in this issue—is the only publicly held subsidiary of E.W. Scripps, which owns 75% of the company. Other subsidiaries include Scripps-Howard Newspapers; United Media Enterprises, parent company of United Features Syndicate and Newspaper Enterprise Assn.(both feature services); community weekly newspapers, and area business publications.

During the past year, E.W. Scripps has been busy divesting itself of properties, consolidating its divisions and reorganizing its corporate management structure. The March, 1982, sale of the United Press International (UPI) wire service to Media News Corp. has resolved much of the company's operating problems, said Edward W. Estlow, E.W. Scripps' president. "Now we intend to be considerably more aggressive in acquisitions in all media and allied and contiguous fields," he said. "Like everyone else, we're currently working on an acquisition."

Besides selling UPI, E.W. Scripps sold its weekly newspapers in suburban Louisville, Ky., last October to William Matthews, who had been editor and general manager of the publications the three years that E.W. Scripps had owned them. Mr. Estlow blamed the economic times for the decision to sell. However, the Scripps-Howard Web Press Co., which composes, prints and mails newspapers and newpaper inserts for various clients, will continue under the E.W. Scripps banner in Louisville.

Of the company's 16 dailies, which boast a total circulation figure of 1.16 million, the Rocky Mountain News in Denver is both the largest and the fastest growing. Current daily circulation stands at 324,320, an increase of 4% over a year ago. It is outdistancing the Pittsburgh Press, E.W. Scripps' second-ranking paper, which has a daily circulation of 255,482.

The Rocky Mountain News' success is fueled by its competition with the Denver Post, a Times Mirror Co. publication. Besides competing on a business level, both papers have been reporting on a story concerning the former editor of the Rocky Mountain News, Michael Balfe Howard, and his alleged use of police officers as bodyguards and even more extensive coverage of his alleged use of cocaine and alcohol.

Outside its newspaper operations, the News is a joint-venture partner with Mile Hi Cablevision (owned by Time Inc.'s American Television & Communications, the Daniels Co., and local Denver investors) in planning Denver's new 108-channel cable tv programing. Parent E.W. Scripps plans to become a limited partner in the actual ownership of the system, which is projected to reach 220,000 homes. Details of that agreement are still being worked out.

Another E.W. Scripps development in cable is its joint-venture agreement with Tele-Communications Inc. in the formation of a new company, called Tele-Scripps. Besides selling advertising for cable programs in the Tennessee area, Tele-Scripps plans to reach 500,000 cable tv households in the tri-state area surrounding Pittsburgh via an interconnect linkup of area systems. Most recently, Tele-Scripps announced plans to organize a sports network.

On Oct. 5, Scripps-Howard News Service was merged with United Media Enterprises' Independent News Alliance. The newly combined news-features service is designed to emphasize news analysis, investigative reporting and editorials rather than spot news coverage.

The E.W. Scripps business publications subsidiary, Cordovan Publications, continued to publish its 12 business journals, increasing total circulation to 120,000. E.W. Scripps said it plans to continue expansion of its business press holdings.

Just across the Hudson from New York, there's a suburban newspaper that many astute media buyers regard as metropolitan.

The Record, New Jersey's largest evening newspaper, is the flagship of the 84th largest media corporation in the country.

It takes clout to climb to the top 100. The Record has it, outsailing all other media in $10.7 billion Bergen County.

This year, The Record's dominance in Bergen helped distinguish it as Number One in linage among all of the nation's evening and Sunday combination newspapers, measured by Media Records. It adds up to a staggering 52,307,644 total lines of full-run advertising.

The Record combines editorial excellence and the most advanced color capability in the industry to fulfill all its reader needs and advertising wants.

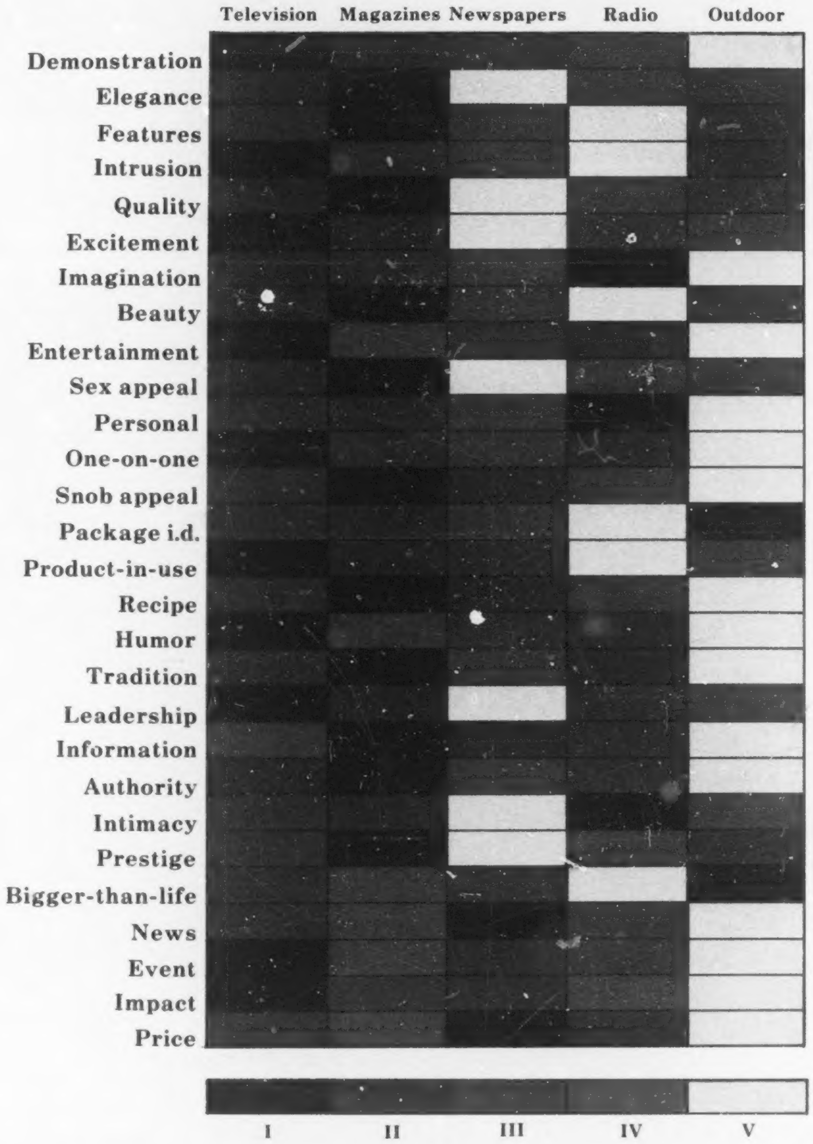
Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co.

Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co., Cleveland, is the nation's 83rd largest media company, with revenues of $95.6 million, representing a 10% increase from $87.3 million in 1981. The company derives all of its revenue from media operations.

Net income before a cumulative effect of change in accounting principle increased 11.3% in 1982 over 1981 to $19.5 million. If next year's revenues proceed at the same rate, the publicly owned company expects to surpass the $100 million mark for the first time in its history. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting is 75% owned by E.W. Scripps Co. (see separate listing).

A total of 87% of the company's operating revenues came from television in 1982, reflecting a continuing downward trend (90% in 1981, 93% in 1980 and 95% in 1979) as the company seeks to diversify. "Tv is always going to be the major thing. But being in cable and having more radio stations is our way of diversifying," said company president Donald L. Perris.

Which media do it best



Source: NH&S/USA

A study conducted by NH&S/USA orders media by its quality, rather than traditional quantitative measures, for delivering particular messages to an audience.

Throughout 1982, Scripps-Howard diligently extended its cable operations. Continued major acquisitions are planned for 1983 and beyond. The company currently owns and operates cable systems in California, Colorado and Florida and holds about a 50% interest in Ann Arbor, Mich., and Connecticut-based systems. On March 1, Scripps-Howard Cable Co., the cable subsidiary of Scripps-Howard Broadcasting, together with partner Charles F. Dolan, a major cable developer, signed an agreement to acquire the Southern Connecticut Cablevision system, which currently passes 95,000 homes in the Bridgeport area. At present, the system serves 43,000 subscribers but is expected to reach an estimated 55,000 at maturity.

Once the agreement is completed, the two Connecticut systems would become Scripps-Howard's largest single area of cable operations, reaching more than 250,000 homes. It would also be one of the country's largest cable operations not located within a large city.

Scripps-Howard's cable system serving Tulare County, Cal., started up in April 1983. That was preceded in March by the startup of the Longmont, Colo., system, approximately 35 miles north of Denver. By year's end, a second Colorado cable operation, Lafayette Communications Corp., should be in operation. Scripps-Howard acquired the five franchises for the Lafayette area from Storer Communications.

Most of the Scripps-Howard's newly acquired or pending systems are located near or adjacent to its existing systems. Further expansion in cable, the company indicated, would follow the same format. This would allow large subscriber bases, which are attractive to advertisers.

Scripps-Howard is committed to looking for further acquisitions in cable. A revolving credit agreement with Chemical Bank for $25 million should help it to fund its cable endeavors throughout 1983.

On Jan. 1, Michael W. Callaghan, who has been with Scripps-Howard since 1972, was elected president of Scripps-Howard Cable Services Co., with headquarters in Wellesley, Mass.

Besides cable, another priority is Scripps-Howard's stronghold—television. The company currently owns and operates five vhf stations (the maximum allowed by law) and one uhf station. The company is seeking to acquire a second uhf station, which would bring it up to the legal limit of tv holdings. An acquisition, the company said, would likely be in a market larger than Kansas City, the home of its current uhf holding, KSHB.

Radio stations in large areas with growth potential are also under serious consideration, despite the company's sale in March, 1982, of WNOX, an am station in Knoxville, Tenn., for about $794,000 to Mack Sanders, who owns stations in that area. According to Mr. Perris, several factors influenced the Knoxville sale: Scripps-Howard owns a vhf television station (WMC-TV) and WMC-AM-FM in Memphis. In addition, parent company E.W. Scripps owns a newspaper in Knoxville (the Knoxville News Sentinel). Federal regulations, as a result, would prohibit Scripps-Howard from acquiring an fm station in the area.

Seattle Times Co.

Seattle Times Co. is the nation's 75th largest media company, with estimated revenues in 1982 of $116.5 million, all from newspaper properties. This represents a decrease of 1.5% from the $118.3 million the company recorded in 1981.

The privately held company, owned by Seattle's Blethen family (50.5%) and Knight-Ridder Newspapers (49.5%), comprises the Seattle Times and the Walla Walla (Wash.) Union-Bulletin.

However, contributing to future revenues will be those generated in a joint operating agreement with Hearst Corp.'s Seattle Post-Intelligencer, approved in May by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco. The two big city dailies began operating jointly with the Sunday paper of May 22. The appellate court decision, however, is expected to be appealed before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Under the agreement, the two papers are combining their management, sales, production and circulation departments. The Times gets 66% of the revenues, the P-I, 34%.

The agreement also calls for the Times to drop its morning edition; the P-I is to have the weekday morning market to itself. The Times only recently forced most of its suburban and regional subscribers to take its morning edition (the paper had switched to all-day production in recent years after having been an afternoon-only daily).

Harold Fuhrman, general manager of the Times, expects that Sunday circulation should reach about 500,000 under the merged Sunday editions of the papers. But because the Times is dropping its morning edition, it will lose "some" daily circulation, said Mr. Fuhrman.

The Times may have to make other changes as well. Seattle has been invaded by total market coverage operations. As for the Times, Mr. Fuhrman said, "We've looked at total market coverage and talked with some advertisers." But he declined to say whether his company has "definite plans" to enter the field. He did say the Times would probably use the technique by inserting a topper with the newspaper to reach subscribers and mailing copies of the circular to everyone else.

Meanwhile, ad linage and circulation figures show that performance was essentially flat in 1982, compared with that of 1981. Total linage for 1982 was 3,561,624, or 7% less than the 3,821,485 lines recorded in 1981. Linage in the first quarter of 1983 dropped 3.2% from 783,427 in 1982 to 758,357.

Circulation likewise has decreased. According to Audit Bureau of Circulations figures for the six months ending March 31, the Seattle Times had a daily circulation of 249,653, down from 256,888 a year earlier. Sunday circulation also declined during the same period, dropping from 339,921 in 1982 to 338,582 in March.

In the area of new technology, the Seattle Times Co. and several other media concerns have agreements with Knight-Ridder to test K-R's much publicized Viewtron videotex system in their markets.

Southern Progress Corp.

Southern Progress Corp., Birmingham, Ala., is the country's 80th largest media company, with estimated revenues from media operations of $100.0 million in fiscal 1982, ended Nov. 30. This represented a 25% increase from the 1981 estimate of $80.0 million in media revenues.

The privately held company declined to release total corporate revenues, but it is believed that the company's fastest-growing nonmedia division—its book publishing house—contributed substantial revenue during the last year.

Southern Living is the company's most profitable publication. It is widely held to be the most profitable regional magazine in the country. It may be the largest as well, serving a 16-state area in the South. Its current circulation rate base is more than 2 million. Revenues come half from subscriptions and half from advertising. During 1982 the subscription price was raised from $16 a year to $18 a year.

"And we don't offer any cut-rate subscriptions," says Emory O. Cunningham, president of Southern Progress and creator of Southern Living.

Accused by many of shunning coverage of controversial subjects, Southern Living is content to provide gardening tips, recipes, photos of stately Southern homes, profiles of Southern cities and towns, travel suggestions and the like—to further the pride of the South and its beauty. It's a formula that has worked well for the 17-year-old magazine, as evidenced by its consistent growth.

Ad pages for fiscal 1982 were up by 51 over the previous year. According to Mr. Cunningham, for the first six months of fiscal year 1983, ad pages were already up by 25. Total pages grew to 3,114 in 1982 from 2,914 in 1981.

The company's flagship publication, Progressive Farmer, more than 95 years old, is a monthly received by 615,000 subscribers in the rural South. It emphasizes strong farm organizations, improved rural health facilities and more economical crop and livestock production. Progressive Farmer publishes five regional editions throughout the South, features reports on cotton, soybeans, peanuts, pork and tobacco and includes a special section called "Country Living," a "life style" section for rural southern families.

Within the last two years the magazine has added subscribers in farming communities in the Midwest with a small demographic edition geared for corn and soybean producers.

The company's first national magazine publishing effort, Decorating & Craft Ideas, is also its fastest-growing magazine, and, according to Mr. Cunningham, it has experienced the largest growth percentage of all Southern Progress publications. Purchased from Tandy Corp. in 1975, Decorating & Craft Ideas now has a circulation of nearly 700,000 and has grown from being published four times a year to 10. Plans call for it to be a monthly in 1984.

Southern Progress also produces a syndicated radio show through its Progressive Farmer network, which provides business news of agriculture. It is heard over 85 stations in Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi and Missouri—nearly double the 44 stations that carried it in 1981.

As the company moved well into fiscal 1983, Mr. Cunningham expressed confidence that the year would be Southern Progress' best yet. He believes the large migration to the Sunbelt has had marked influence on the company's publications, and all projections of the numbers of people to move south "in reality are going to be greater" than predicted.

During the year, James E. De Vira was promoted to vp-publisher of Southern Living, from director of advertising, and Don Logan was promoted to vp-corporate development.

For Wishbone our displays were a wish come true.

At Henschel-Steinau we produce a wide variety of practical and versatile stock units that can be easily adapted to the needs of companies like Lipton. Our skilled designers and engineers have customized these units into prize winning displays that are extremely effective at the retail level as well as offering these advantages:

- Eliminating the high costs and lengthy tooling time means fast delivery and better economy.
- Because of the wide variety of our stock units you can have the flexibility of custom design without the cost.
- Although ruggedly constructed for permanant use they are UPS shippable and can be set up and knocked down without tools.
- They can be ordered in limited quantities for test market situations.
- A large selection of stock trays and supports molded in any color can be custom decorated by silk screening, hot stamping or labeling.

Why not join Lipton, and many other major companies, and investigate the advantages of Henschel-Steinau stock displays. You'll find them a highly attractive and extremely economical answer to a great many display situations.

Storer Communications

Storer Communications, Miami, is the 22nd largest media company in the country, with revenues in 1982 of $379.3 million, all generated by the company's cable and broadcast operations. The total is an increase of 37% from 1981 revenues of $276.4 million. Of this figure, broadcast stations accounted for 41% and cable communications, 59%.

A change of corporate name (formerly Storer Broadcasting Co.) and a move to new corporate headquarters in northeast Miami last year were part of some new operating philosophies that have taken hold at the publicly held company. Storer forthrightly said it is cooling its cable franchise expansion and is declaring a new modus operandi. It has entered an "operational mode" and the focus is on increasing the "effectiveness and efficiency" of all company interests.

Storer owns and operates seven television stations and holds franchises to provide cable communications service to 630 communities in 19 states. The company's cable systems serviced about 1.16 million basic subscribers in 1982 and passed 3.3 million homes in franchised areas.

Although 1982 was characterized as "a successful year," complete with "alltime high revenues," Storer did not escape a brush with the recession. The cable division's growth fell short of original projections (1.25 million subscribers) and net income for the year declined "by a significant amount." Reasons given for this were high prime interest rates and greater depreciation charges related to the cable expansion program. The company does, however, target 1.5 million subscribers for 1983.

Cable systems activated in fiscal year 1982 were in West Pasco, Fla.; Point Clear, Ala.; Kenton/Boone Counties, Ky.; Campbell County, Ky.; Tomball, Tex.; Carrollton, Tex.; South Dade County, Fla.; Florissant, Mo. (including St. Louis County); Bryant, Ariz.; Fort Lupton, Colo.; Villa Park, Cal.; Aloha, Ore.; Washington County, Ore.; Paradise Valley, Ariz., and Glendale, Ariz.

Average revenue per subscriber had its best year in 1982. Capital expenditures to support and encourage subscriber growth were at a record high as well—$315 million. Of course, in keeping with this spending was a higher debt and interest expense level, something the company indicated it was looking to reduce.

In fact, higher interest expense, engendered by new cable systems construction, reportedly was to blame for a loss of $11 million the first quarter of 1983. Revenue for that period was $101.5 million, a 26% increase over first-quarter 1982 revenues.

In May, 1982, about 18,000 basic cable subscribers to Storer systems in several Phoenix suburbs were treated to a dose of some new technology. At that time, R/G Cable, a new division of two newspapers—the Arizona Republic and Phoenix Gazette—offered its classified ad cable channel, R/G Vision Classified.

In Miami, Storer did some dabbling in new technology itself. Last summer, Storer Cable launched the first computerized fiber optic cable tv system, dubbed the MiniHub system. This was the first attempt by a cable system to use this type of technology. Fiber optics are seen as a means of realizing cost savings in cable operations.

Meanwhile, revenues and operating profits of the company's seven tv stations were at an alltime high in 1982. WAGA-TV in Atlanta and WSBK-TV in Boston turned in especially good performances in revenues and audience levels.

Also last summer, a news and talk am radio station, WELI in Connecticut, agreed to provide Storer Cable Tv of Connecticut hourly 60-second local news inserts. The concept was dubbed "radiovision."

Taft Broadcasting

Taft Broadcasting Co., Cincinnati, is the nation's 69th largest media company, with media property revenues totaling $125.1 million for the year ended March 31, 1982, up from $112.2 million in 1981.

Broadcasting and cable accounted for all of the company's media revenues, or about 35% of Taft's total revenues of $358.2 million in fiscal 1982. Taft's seven tv and six am and fm radio properties contributed $45.6 million in operating profit, or 61% of total corporate operating profit.

Taft's tv units generated $95.7 million in revenue during the fiscal year, up 12% from the previous year, and its radio stations brought $29.4 million in revenues, an increase of 9%.

Although fiscal 1983 concluded this March 31, for consistency the figures used to rank Taft in this issue are for fiscal 1982.

Taft's broadcast operations, however, continued to show similar increases in fiscal 1983. Together, radio and tv increased 13% to $140.8 million, compared to a 12% increase for the media units from fiscal 1981 to 1982. Operating profit increased 19% compared to a 40% increase the previous year. Total revenues were $381 million, a 6% increase from 1981.

In addition to its core broadcasting business, Taft has an entertainment division—which produces and distributes tv programing and makes motion pictures—and an attractions group, which owns four amusement parks and will open another in Houston in 1984.

Broadcasting, however, remains Taft's biggest interest, and it continues to invest heavily in that area. It owns its full complement of five vhf stations—in Birmingham, Ala.; Cincinnati; Columbus, O.; Kansas City, Mo., and Miami—along with uhf stations in Washington and Philadelphia.

In April, 1983, Taft completed the transaction that gave it a foothold in Miami—the nation's 13th largest market. Taft traded Boston-based General Cinema Corp., its Buffalo affiliate and $70 million in return for WCIX-TV in Miami, a vhf independent.

Taft is pioneering in the broadcast of teletext at the local level. Its flagship station, WKRC in Cincinnati, began experimenting with it last July, and in January signed a five-year agreement with Zenith Radio Corp. giving that company the right to market decoders for its service, which uses the British-based World System Teletext.

When the Federal Communications Commission authorized the commercial broadcasting of teletext March 31, Zenith immediately began production, and Terry Connelly, Taft's vp-tv news, said the Zenith decoder should reach the market this month, marking the first time such equipment is available to U.S. consumers for under $300.

WKRC teletext carries about 100 pages of news, sports, weather, business information, community events and movie listings—"in short, a typical daily newspaper," Mr. Connelly said. WKRC viewers can select the "page" of information they want to receive by using a hand-held selector.

Plans call for the service eventually to become ad supported.

Teletext is a one-way service of printed information transmitted on the vertical blanking interval (an unused portion of the tv signal) that is discernable only to viewers who have proper decoders.

In 1981 Taft entered the cable market via a partnership with Tele-Communications Inc., Denver, and the group now owns 16 systems in Michigan and New England.

The joint venture, TCI-Taft Cablevision Associates, picked up eight systems in Michigan within the past year, but officials say they're not planning to extend beyond current boundaries.

TCI-Taft's 16 systems have 137,000 subscribers of which 62,000 are paid. By upgrading the systems, they hope to increase penetration to 200,000.

Officials say the cable project probably won't turn a profit for another three to five years.

Taft got into the programing business in 1966 when it acquired Hanna-Barbera Productions, and it now owns seven companies that produce animated programing, live-action tv shows and theatrical films.

Tele-Communications Inc.

Tele-Communications Inc. was the nation's 33rd largest media company in 1982, with $265.6 million in media revenues, or 94% of total revenues of $282.6 million. Media revenues were $167.7 million in 1981, or 93% of the total revenues of $181.4 million.

Tele-Communications in 1982 continued its hyperactivity of the last two years. In that time, the publicly owned Denver-based cable tv and microwave common carrier nearly doubled its subscribers, doubled its revenues, and rose from third to first among the nation's largest multiple systems operators.

The company derives all media revenues from cable tv; the remaining 6% of revenues comes from microwave operations, which were up 24% to $16.9 million from $13.7 million in 1981

According to TCI executive vp J.C. Sparkman, last year's major achievement was the "laying out of the new marketing concept," which will eventually include offering ad supported satellite program services and pay-service groups such as HBO and Showtime on all TCI's approximatel 400 systems nationwide.

Part and parcel of the new plan is a technology the company calls "addressability," a service that will enable TCI to change subscriber service levels electronically by satellite from its Denver-based computer.

The new concept will benefit subscribers as well as TCI. For example, any change in service that a subscriber wants can be made in "real time," that is, instantaneously, by calling an 800 or 900 number. It will save the subscriber time and make more pay-per-view choices available Also, subscribers on some of the smaller systems will now have access to all the services as the "economies of scale" of making the addressable concept national allows the larger systems to shoulder the cost of converting some of the smaller operations.

And it will benefit TCI by shaving costs. With all systems electronically controlled from a central source, the cost of the individual service call vanishes.

TCI has also taken a strong stance when it comes to a program guide. No TV-Cable Week for TCI subscribers. The company has designed its own, "Cabletime," a monthly guide that will be available as part of the national program. It will eventually carry advertising.

TCI's national program service will benefit advertisers, too. National advertisers will be able to reach all of TCI's systems with a single spot. Before, single spots were limited to specific regions.

The program will take a while to complete. Launched last November in Parkersburg, W.Va., the schedule is for all of TCI's 400 systems to be "addressable" within three years.

And it is expensive. With each of the addressable converters costing $100, the over-all cost will be enormous. In fact, TCI and New York-based General Instrument Corp. recently signed a contract in which TCI will spend $100 million for addressable converters and other equipment that will enable subscribers to receive and send signals to TCI.

One of the benefits of the national program became apparent earlier this spring. TCI decided that the Disney Channel would be the first addressable service made available to subscribers. On April 19, instead of offering the service on a plant by plant basis, as had been done in the past, the service was instantaneously available to 165 cable plants, serving some 1.3 million basic cable subscribers. The difference, says Mr. Sparkman, between TCI's approach and other mso operations is the ability to reach so many so fast.

TCI's basic subscribers were up to 2.2 million by yearend, up 30% from the year before. Pay tv subscribers were up to 1.4 million, a 47% increase from 1981.

The new subscribers rode into the TCI cable corral on the back of new acquisitions that cost the company some $99 million directly, and $170.5 million through its joint venture operations.

Last year, to better manage its mushrooming cable household, the company reorganized its field operations by dividing its systems in 45 states into 11 geographic regions, each supervised by a group manager.

Among TCI's 1982 acquisitions in the first quarter of the year were, through its TKR partnership, New Jersey-based Cross Country Cable, with 43,000 subscribers; and, through its TCI/Taft partnership, there were three new properties: Cape Cod Cablevision, with 29,000 subscribers in Massachusetts, Six Star, Pomona, Cal., with 36,000 subscribers and Key West, Fla., with 27,000.

In April, the Plains Cable Group was acquired, with 81,500 basic cable and 25,000 pay subscribers. And in July, TCI/Taft acquired another 8,000 subscribers in Michigan. This year has already been punctuated with some substantial plans for acquisitions, among them Liberty Communications in Eugene, Ore. Liberty operates six tv stations and cable systems in ten states, serving some 250,000 basic subscribers and 143,000 pay subscribers. The company had total revenues in 1982 of $60 million, $41 million coming from cable. Reportedly, the deal will be concluded this month or next, and will cost TCI some $182 million.

And in March, an announcement was made that TCI and E.W. Scripps Co. will be forming a joint venture to acquire, develop and operate cable tv systems.

Thomson Newspapers Ltd.

Thomson Newspapers Ltd., Toronto, Ont., is the 37th largest media company in the country, with 1982 operating revenues of $254.0 million from its newspaper properties in the U.S. These revenues comprise about 47% of the company's total revenues of $539.8 million.

In 1981, Thomson's revenues from U.S. media operations were $232.4, or 43% of total revenues of $536.2 million. Media revenues increased 9.3%, while total revenues were up 3% in 1982.

Operating income from the U.S. division, based in Des Plaines, Ill., was $97.2 million, up 7.8% from 1981, and was favorably affected by restructured financing arrangements that reduced U.S. income tax.

In 1982, Thomson purchased four daily newspapers in the U.S.: Daily Mining Gazette (Houghton, Mich.), Griffin (Ga.) Daily News, Jacksonville (Ill.) Journal Courier and Whittier (Cal.) Daily News. Early this year, it also purchased the Waukesha (Wis.) Freeman. According to Audit Bureau of Circulations, the five papers have a combined daily average circulation of 81,964.

Thomson has stressed acquisition of newspaper properties in the U.S. because of what the company calls the large number of independently owned properties still available stateside. Another reason this policy may continue is that the federal government in Canada may make good its threat to limit group ownership of newspapers to no more than 20% of daily national newspaper circulation.

According to its shareholders report, the company has no intention—apart from its interest in Augusta Newsprint Co., August, Ga.—"to diversify beyond the newspaper publishing business."

In May, 1981, the company was charged under the Combined Investigation Act for alleged improprieties in its newspaper publishing operations in Montreal, Ottawa, Winnepeg and Vancouver. The trial is scheduled for September, and the company says "all charges will be vigorously defended."

Time Inc.

Time Inc., New York, is the country's third largest media company, with $1.83 billion in revenues from media operations, a 21% increase from 1982. Media operations—made up of the company's extensive magazine and video holdings—represented 51% of Time Inc.'s total 1982 revenues of $3.56 billion, a sum 8% higher than $3.30 billion in 1981.

Magazines contributed $941 million in 1982 revenues, followed by video with $864 million and Pioneer Press, a chain of weekly newspapers, with an estimated $25 million. Operating income was $105 million for magazines and $166 million for video. Income figures for Pioneer Press are not broken out by Time.

Other income in 1982 came from Time Inc.'s book publishing operations, a variety of smaller enterprises and its large forest products division.

Just last month, Time Inc. announced it would spin off its forest products business to devote its energies to publishing and video operations. Forest products in 1982 accounted for nearly $1.2 billion of the company's consolidated revenues.

If 1982 was a recession year, it would be hard to tell from the performance at Time Inc. All its existing magazines had a robust year, the video group continued to show impressive growth, and the company expanded further in both areas.

One of the 60-year-old company's more daring moves last year was to launch TV-Cable Week, a $100-million gamble to capture the cable viewing audience in the country.

This competitor to TV Guide and a plethora of cable guides may end up as the company's largest—and most profitable—magazine by the end of the decade, or it may end up flopping as the logistics of trying to provide a distinct magazine for the hundreds of cable systems around the country prove unworkable. Time Inc. executives acknowledge that the magazine may not be profitable for as many as five years. The weekly magazine made its debut in April with five cable systems signed up as charter subscribers.

Expansion came to other Time Inc. publications as well, as the company developed Fortune International, an overseas spinoff of that every-other-week publication.

Last year Time again led all magazines measured by the Publishers Information Bureau (PIB), with 1982 ad revenues of $256.4 million, a 1% increase over 1981. That gain came despite an ad page decline of 9%, to 2,641 pages from 2,908. Ad revenue gains at five of the company's other six magazines were even more impressive: Sports Illustrated up 6% to $162.9 million, People up 17% to $159.4 million, Fortune up 8% to $76.2 million, Money up 45% to $32.9 million and Discover up 81% to $9.6 million. Life revenues were flat at $23.2 million. Circulation revenues also grew last year, and will probably continue to do so. All seven magazines will have raised subscription prices by the end of the year.

For the company, 1982 was a watershed year, as the video group for the first time contributed more to the company's operating profit than did publishing holdings; it now accounts for almost half of Time Inc.'s operating profit.

Home Box Office, now in its 10th year of operation, continues to be the country's dominant pay-tv service. During 1982, the number of HBO subscribers grew to 11.5 million. Cinemax, a companion service to HBO, doubled its subscriber count to 2 million in 1982 and planned in 1983 to revamp its service to broaden its appeal even further. HBO also went beyond its longtime practice of purchasing popular Hollywood movies to develop its own programing ventures, such as pay-tv movies and such series as "Fraggle Rock" and "Not Necessarily the News."

An even bigger move last year by HBO was its decision to join Columbia Pictures and CBS Inc. into creating a motion picture company that they hope would grow into one of Hollywood's major studios. The studio, which has been named Nova, will be equally owned and financed by the three partners, but will be managed independently.

American Television & Communications, which operates cable tv systems in more than 400 municipalities in 33 states, increased its basic cable subscribers to 2.1 million in 1982 and its pay-tv subscribers to 1.9 million, making it the largest such multiple system operator in the country. While growth in this area in the past has chiefly come by winning new franchises in large markets, ATC in 1982 decided instead to concentrate on developing a "cluster" strategy that involves acquiring existing cable systems contiguous to its current holdings.

In other video areas at Time Inc., teletext continues to be a major development program, with market tests being conducted in Orlando, Fla., and San Diego. This year will be devoted to testing teletext's content, consumer appeal and potential as an advertising medium.

The one disappointing note in the company's video group—and practically the company's whole media operations—was the dismal performance of subscription tv (stv). Stv is plagued by high fixed initial costs.

None of Time Inc.'s three stv stations in Dallas, Cleveland and Boston broke even last year. The Dallas operation was sold to Golden West STV in September.

The company also sold off its lone broadcast tv station in 1982, WOTV in Grand Rapids, Mich, to LIN Broadcasting for $32 million.

Times Mirror Co.

Times Mirror Co., Los Angeles, is the country's sixth largest media company, with media operations accounting for $1.49 billion, or 67% of total 1982 revenues of $2.21 billion.

Media revenues rose 9% from last year's $1.37 billion. Total revenues were up 3% from 1981.

Newspapers accounted for $1.14 billion, broadcast for $100 million, cable for $125 million and magazines for $123 million. Newspapers, which represent 48.1% of total company revenues, wound up with a 7% increase from 1981's $1.07 billion level. Broadcast revenues increased 15% to $100 million from the $87 million reported in the previous year.

Times Mirror's over-all performance, however, did not match that of 1981. Net income decreased 7% to $140 million, attributed to declines in classified advertising linage at most of its seven daily newspapers and to unit-volume decreases in both the newsprint manufacturing and wood products components of its newsprint and forest prod-

Who's on deck in the media ceo circle?

By John Revett

Don't place too many bets. Boardroom coups, longshot winners and new talent from outside are definitely among the risks. But here are a few of what we might call "succession situations" among top media companies.

Gannett Co.: Black and white and read all over. That's the nation's biggest newspaper chain, the fifth largest media company, and the motif of chairman Allen Neuharth. He is said by insiders to be under heavy pressure to deliver with USA Today. It's a tremendous undertaking and could be the right idea at the right time. The company estimates the circulation at more than 1 million.

Mr. Neuharth has no shortage of enemies inside and outside Gannett. An executive at the Rochester, N.Y., headquarters was said to have been shown a Savvy photo of Mr. Neuharth in his black and white Washington office, outfitted in his customary black and white attire, including black cowboy boots. "At least the boots weren't white" was reportedly the man's reaction.

Others in the Gannett organization have objected to the presence of Neuharth's son, Dan, on the USA Today staff and recall that the chairman's former wife was on the payroll as a consultant.

But Mr. Neuharth appears to continue in control of Gannett with no serious challenge and the boots seem to be made for walking. If they stumble, the successor most often mentioned is board member Douglas McCorkindale. If succession moves back to Rochester, the name heard is corporate news division chief John Heselden, described as a student of the Frank Gannett "home town" school of publishing.

American Broadcasting Cos. The largest U.S. media company, with interests ranging from the hard-nosed study of business at Chilton Research to soft-nosed news about cocaine at Los Angeles magazine, has its cameras focused on the central arena for ABC and John Severino, president of ABC Television. Chairman Leonard H. Goldenson has not at this writing announced an intention of stepping aside. And Fred Pierce was just recently elevated to ABC president and chief executive officer. Mr. Severino has moved up rapidly from ABC-TV affiliate head in Los Angeles and vice-chairman Elton H. Rule is looking at retirement towards the end of this year. Mr. Severino would be the news. Unless, of course, the networks start playing musical chairs in the face of growing cable competition.

NBC (RCA Corp.): You'd guess he might want to be in the hills over Hollywood. But that's not the current word on NBC chairman Grant Tinker. There are a few people who've had enough of life in the Deal Capital of entertainment.

Speculation is that ex-newsman Robert Mulholland (president) is a refreshing associate for Mr. Tinker and that the New York job has given him a chance to excel in new areas. None of this has stopped talk to the effect that Mr. Tinker is a programing creative type, and that that could create surprises. Mr. Mulholland?

CBS: President Thomas H. Wyman has to be regarded with respect in view of William Paley's departure without Mr. Wyman's scalp.

Time Inc: Made a careful, if not entirely unquestioned—but careful, very careful—transition from Andrew Heiskell to Ralph Davidson as chairman and J. Richard Munro as president. They're both in their mid-50s, "and the company wants continuity," a spokesman said.

Times Mirror Co.: Tom Johnson, head of the flagship Los Angeles Times, is running hard. In the tradition of that newspaper and the regime of Otis Chandler (who has evidently come back downtown from Malibu to resume full command), Mr. Johnson might begin taking life just the tiniest bit less seriously. There are two Chandler sons who might suddenly—you never know—stand up to be counted. And their father might like it.

S.I. Newhouse & Sons: Evidently the recession and fears about jobs continue. Top editorial employes at both the Newark Star Ledger and the Cleveland Plain Dealer, two major Newhouse properties, declined comment of any sort on who might be in line to succeed Samuel Newhouse Jr.

It can be assumed that Christopher Newhouse, in his late 20s, will be able to pay his bills. Older son Donald runs the newspaper division and is said to more or less divide top management duties with S.I. Jr.

Washington Post Co.: When questioned, those who cover the Post's turf and keep an eye on it ask, "You mean, who's going to succeed Ben Bradlee?!"

One can envision the longtime editor injecting his brand of wisdom into any decision on a successor to Katharine Graham, but no one is saying Mrs. Graham plans to do anything but continue as chairman. Her son Donald would appear to be next in line, but there also seems to be a sturdy link with Richard Simmons, who came from Dun & Bradstreet, and as president of the Washington Post Co. has made an impact. Do people who clear up odd situations, i.e., divesting the company of the Trenton newspaper and folding Inside Sports, make it to the very corporate top?

It has been noted that Mr. Simmons is more than a fireman. He has gotten the company into new cable sports networks and a Washington legislative tracking service.

Two major media companies that seem fairly set in their lines of succession—we don't swear this will be right tomorrow—are the New York Times Co. and Hearst Corp. You could add Knight-Ridder Newspapers to that list if you were daring. One item: Don't count out Los Angeles Herald Examiner president Frank Dale at Hearst. He has very nearly brought a newspaper back from the dead by giving it a heart transplant that Herald people swear is surviving the smog.

John Revett, a former Advertising Age senior editor, is working on his second novel in Phoenix, Ariz.

ucts group, conditions it says were brought on by the recession.

Total ad linage at Times Mirror newspapers finished 2% above 1981 figures, but classified linage fell nearly 9% during the year. At the Los Angeles Times, longtime national leader in classified advertising, that category fell a staggering 23%.

To slow the decline, most of the newspapers started strong sales and promotional programs, and started "total market coverage" advertising vehicles to recoup advertising lost to community newspapers. Some, such as the Los Angeles Times, undertook a strict cost-cutting program, freezing hiring, cutting back certain weekly sections, and urging staff to curtail travel and entertainment expenses.

Times Mirror's efforts to improve the competitive stance of the Dallas Times Herald and the Denver Post were a further drain on newspaper profits during the year.

Dallas was the scene of an old-fashioned newspaper war between the Times Herald and the Dallas Morning News, which has dominated the morning market and big ad accounts geared to the upscale market. The Times Herald reoriented its editorial product to appeal to affluent, young families, adding a high-fashion section designed with that segment in mind; it opened 10 new news bureaus and added 40 more editorial employes.

The paper also started offering extensive advertising discounts—a ploy critics say reflects the level of desperation the Times Herald has reached.

Distribution costs at the Denver Post were high, because of its conversion from an afternoon to an all-day newspaper during the year. In addition, the company purchased a 42-acre tract of land in Denver for a new printing facility.

In February, 1983, Times Mirror sold the money-losing Orange Coast Publishing Co., publisher of Orange Coast Daily Pilot, for a reported $8 million to an affiliate of Ingersoll Publications of Sharon, Conn.

By the fourth quarter, operating profit of the newspaper group, aided by lower newsprint prices, moved ahead of the prior year for the first time during the year.

Despite the recession, many Times Mirror newspapers achieved record circulation levels. The Los Angeles Times reached a daily circulation of 1,059,023; its Sunday circulation advanced to 1,321,885. Likewise, Newsday grew to 516,296 daily circulation; its Sunday circulation increased to 582,745.

While newspapers have traditionally been the core of Times Mirror's business, many observers believe the company is betting its future on electronics in the coming information age. During the year it strengthened its position in that field, with expansion in broadcast, cable tv and other new technologies.

Broadcast revenues increased 15% as operating profits reached $49.4 million in 1982, up 21% from $40.9 million in 1981. The company says it wants to acquire additional tv stations in larger markets.

Times Mirror's cable operations had some difficulties, mostly because of the high costs associated with the growth of cable systems in several urban areas and due to the slowdown in growth of subscribers to basic and premium services. Cable tv revenues increased 21% to $125 million, but operating profits declined 14% from $23.2 million to $20 million in 1982.

As a step toward eliminating viewer confusion about cable tv, Times Mirror Cable Television started Dimension Cable Television, a way of selling various cable services under one umbrella. Instead of buying Home Box Office and Showtime individually, for example, Times Mirror Cable subscribers are offered these and a number of other options under the Dimension name. It's available in the more than 300 communities served by the Times Mirror system.

Spotlight, a pay cable tv service owned by Times Mirror and four other cable operators, also took steps to strengthen its competitive position. In September, Spotlight switched from a service offering movies and entertainment specials to an around-the-clock, satellite-delivered, all-movie, pay cable service. There are 735,000 Spotlight subscribers at present.

Times Mirror, the seventh largest cable company in the U.S., is also taking more steps to further its cable tv activity. In May, Newsday introduced a 24-hour, news, information and advertising service, "Newsday Channel," to 160,000 homes on Long Island.

Times Publishing Co.

Times Publishing Co., St. Petersburg, Fla., the 72nd largest media company in the U.S., had revenues estimated by Advertising Age at $119.5 million in 1982, all from media operations.

Revenues increased by 8.6% from an estimated 1981 revenue of $110.0 million.

Primary reasons for the increase were Florida's rapid growth in both population and high-technology industry, St. Petersburg's downtown renaissance and a "surging economy in the Tampa Bay area and along Florida's Gulf Coast," according to Eugene C. Patterson, president.

The privately held company cited continued increases in part-run and preprint advertising and constant growth in satellite areas for a 5% to 7% increase in circulation of the St. Petersburg Times to 249,826 daily and 313,529 Sunday.

The company's afternoon newspaper, St. Petersburg Evening Independent, finished 1982 with a circulation of 38,409, down 175 subscriptions from 1981—the second straight year of decreases since the company purchased the paper 20 years ago from Thomson Newspapers Ltd.

This drop is attributed to circulation area cutbacks initiated in 1981 and an increase in price, also started in 1981. Still, the Independent last year had the highest home delivery circulation in its history, according to managing editor Robert Stiff, and so far in 1983, circulation is leading 1982 by 9-10%.

Ad linage was "flat" for 1982, according to Leo L. Kubiet, Times Publishing ad director, rising a modest 2% for the Times, to 81.4 million lines, and dropping for the Independent to 23.4 million. Ad linage rates were increased by 8% in 1982.

Despite those modest figures, the Times continues to lead all U.S. newspapers in tourism and travel advertising, with more than 365,000 lines last year, according to Mr. Kubiet. During the peak tourist season last winter, the combined newspapers posted 16 new daily and Sunday circulation highs, topping 349,000 copies of the Times on one Sunday in February.

One significant change in format was the modification of the city-zone editions published twice weekly with the Times. Renamed the Neighborhood Times and rezoned into three editions, the editorial supplement was also retargeted to Monday and Thursday markets.

The results were dramatic in linage, jumping from 7,500 lines in September, before the changeover, to 14,000 in October, the first month of the new format, and increasing to more than 22,000 lines in November and December.

Another major change for the Times Publishing Co. was the demise of its Sunday magazine, The Floridian.

"Congressional Quarterly," the Washington-based news and reference service covering Congress, national politics and the federal government, plans to add an electronic data service in 1983, the Washington Alert Service, which will give a daily update status report on congressional and Washington activities.

The company's statewide business magazine, Florida Trend, experienced a 10% increase in revenue in 1982, despite a 4% drop in ad pages. With a best-ever circulation of 35,000, the magazine plans a 25th anniversary issue in June as the "oldest regional business magazine in North America," said Andy Corty, general manager.

Triangle Publications

Triangle Publications, Radnor, Pa., is the nation's 19th largest media company, with 1982 operating revenues estimated by ADVERTISING AGE at $549.4 million, all from print media. The company's estimated operating revenues in 1981 were $502.2 million.

The privately owned company, controlled by Walter Annenberg, derives all its revenues from the weekly TV Guide, monthly Seventeen and the Daily Racing Form.

TV Guide, now 30 years old, is the company's principal money maker, with estimated gross revenues of $665.5 million last year, or about 92% of the company's total gross revenues of $720 million, and up 4.5% from $614 million in 1981.

Many magazine industry followers see 1983 as a watershed year for TV Guide, not so much for what it is doing but for what is happening with its competition: Namely, the emergence of Time Inc.'s TV-Cable Week as a possible threat to TV Guide's longtime dominance of the national tv listings business.

The Time Inc. entry into the field in April won't have a significant effect on TV Guide this year, Triangle executives say. "I think we're going to have the best year we've ever had" in ad pages and ad revenues, said Eric G. Larson, TV Guide publisher. In the first quarter, the magazine carried 1,003 ad pages, up 3.2% from the same period in 1982, and had ad revenues of $70.1 million, up 13% from the year earlier period.

TV Guide lost its No. 1 spot in ad revenues among all U.S. magazines to Time last year. By virtue of its large circulation—bringing an estimated $424 million in gross revenues last year—it remains the industry leader in total revenues by a substantial margin over No. 2 Time.

Much of last year's revenue increase apparently stemmed from a 25% increase in the magazine's cover price in the fall of 1981, to 50 cents an issue from 40 cents. The magazine also has been testing a newsstand price of 60 cents an issue in some markets. The price increase primarily contributed to a drop in circulation from 17.7 million at the end of 1981 to 17 million at the end of 1982. At the beginning of last year, the magazine lowered its guaranteed rate base to 17 million from 18.3 million. The magazine's circulation was as high as 19.5 million in 1978, when TV Guide sold for 20 cents.

Last year's ad revenues were the most ever for the magazine, but they have been roughly flat for the last three years. Last year they rose 0.9% to $241.5 million from $239.3 million, which was in turn down from $239.5 million in 1980. Ad pages last year increased 1.5% to 3,616 pages from 3,564 pages. The magazine's best year in ad pages was 1980, when it carried 3,747.

TV Guide executives believe TV-Cable Week will not easily pass Time's 4.5 million circulation, as Time Inc. executives have suggested it might. TV-Cable Week is tailored to individual cable systems, rather than to broader geographical markets, as is TV Guide.

"It seems like they've got a difficult task," Mr. Larson said of Time Inc.'s cable publication. "They may very well succeed, but we're going to try to hang on to the readers we already have in those systems."

Merrill Panitt, editorial director, said TV-Cable Week's handling of program listings and other editorial material contained no discomforting surprises for TV Guide. "I haven't learned much from it," he said.

TV Guide is experimenting with its own system-specific edition—selling to cable subscribers through the local cable system—in Buffalo, N.Y., and in two other markets. "We'd be remiss not to," Mr. Larson said, "but I can't say it'll become a major thrust for us."

According to a TV Guide survey of about 1 million renewing subscribers, 61% of those who renew have cable available to them and 47% are actually has cable. The magazine claims to be especially strong in its pay cable listings. More than 40% of its listings are devoted to cable tv.

Mr. Larson said his mission as the new publisher is "to [make TV Guide] grow enough each year to make people aware that the magazine is alive and a progressing thing. The business hates a loser."

The publisher said that TV Guide's circulation is "showing some good life" and "may be up a couple hundred thousand in circulation this year." He attributed the increase to the improving economy, the magazine's editorial improvements and a new "franchise protection" promotion strategy, which emphasizes the magazine's local, network, basic and pay cable listings instead of each issue's main feature stories. The new ads began in February of this year.

Recent editorial changes include a new eight-page section called "Insider," consisting of gossip and brief items on tv programs and personalities. Mr. Panitt said the magazine also planned to add, this month, 3½ pages previewing what appear to be each week's best tv offerings, tailored to each of the 107 editions and an alphabetical listing of movies shown on pay-cable networks.

Adding such space is costly—TV Guide will spend about $50 million on paper and ink this year, vs. $5 million to $6 million five years ago—and the magazine in July will raise its advertising rates 9.8%, to $85,000 for a four-color page, to offset some of the higher costs. TV Guide raised its rates by 7% last July.

Seventeen's ad pages dropped 2% last year to 1,302, but ad rate increases enabled ad revenues to rise 6.2% to $23.8 million. Circulation in December was 1.52 million, up 2.9% from the previous December.

For the first quarter this year, Seventeen's ad pages were down 8.6% to 247 while ad revenues were down 2.6% to $4.8 million.

Tribune Co.

Tribune Co., Chicago, is the nation's 10th largest media company, with media revenues of $1.24 billion in 1982, or 87% of total operating revenues of 1.43 billion. Media revenues increased 6% from 1981's $1.17 billion, when they represented 83% of total operating revenues of $1.41 billion.

Newspapers accounted for $1.04 billion in 1982, while radio, tv and cable operations accounted for $205.0 million.

Net income was $98.3 million compared with 1981's $138 million, down 21%. This was attributed to the $40 million loss in operating profit from the Canadian newsprint and forest operation, according to the company.

The newspaper group had operating profit of $68.7 million, compared with $66.7 million for 1981. The Chicago Tribune and New York Daily News saw earnings declines while the other newspaper operations had gains.

During the first quarter of this year the Tribune Co. recorded operating revenues of $350.5 million, compared with 1982's first quarter of $333.4 million. Net income doubled during the quarter to $1.1 million, compared with $468,000 for the same reporting period last year.

The media company has apparently survived the storm of 1981, a time that centered on the company's abortive attempts to sell off the Daily News. Ultimately, the Tribune brass backed away from that plan and decided to keep the beleaguered newspaper.

Throughout 1982 and this year, the closely-held company has been preparing for a public offering. Shareholders at the April annual meeting approved a series of amendments to the corporate charter thereby making way for this action. The offering is expected in late 1983 or early 1984, according to the company.

Going public had long been rumored throughout financial and publishing circles, but the first significant indication of that action came in August, 1982, when the board of directors informed stockholders it would no longer buy back shares as they became available, thereby reversing a traditional policy.

Tribune Co. has been closely held for 125 years and is owned by an estimated 400 shareholders. A share of the Tribune Co. is valued at nearly $70,000. The stock is expected to see a split of nearly 2,900-to-1 giving it an estimated $25 to $30 per share price.

By going public, the company assures shareholders a cash bonanza but also infuses the aged communications concern with some needed capital. Still uncertain is what Tribune Co. will do with the extra cash. Some of the money is expected to be targeted toward further acquisitions of broadcast properties and the repayment of debts stemming from the Daily News' $75 million retrenchment program. In addition, the company paid out $180 million to construction of the ultramodern "Freedom Center" printing plant in Chicago.

The construction of Freedom Center, the startup of a new offset printing facility in Orlando, Fla. and further capital improvements at the Canadian operation added up to an estimated $400 million in capital expenditures.

Tribune Co. continues to make good its reborn commitment to the Daily News and says the revitalization program is operating on schedule. The company claims the paper, which for most of 1981 was on the brink of being sold or closed, will be profitable by the end of the year. The combination of job buy-outs, union concessions and sale of the Daily News building will make the paper profitable, according to the company. The 11 Daily News unions agreed to a series of concessions that totaled a $50 million annual savings.

Tribune Co. is streamlining the Daily News' circulation methods by dispatching papers from three plants outside of the Manhattan area. Papers had been shipped from the Daily News building in midtown Manhattan and had serious trouble reaching commuters in the collar communities.

The Chicago Tribune's circulation continued to erode. For six months ending in 1982, circulation was 756,877, compared with 770,798 for the previous reporting period. The dips come at a time when competitor Chicago Sun-Times has redesigned and developed a marketing plan to infiltrate the affluent suburban areas, long the Tribune's stronghold.

Still, whatever threat the No. 2 paper was posing could be seriously tempered, in light of Field Enterprises' decision to sell the newspaper. Sun-Times officials say their game plan remains the same despite the possibility of a sale.

The Tribune implemented zoned advertising, which will be phased into the entire paper.

Additionally, the Tribune must marginally compete with USA Today, which entered the Windy City in March. Thus far the appearance of the national newspaper has not damaged the Tribune. Although the papers are competitors for the consumer's 25 cents, the Tribune Co. has made a deal to print the Gannett newspaper at its Freedom Center plant.

In central Florida the Orlando Sentinel continues to show circulation gains. In April the paper changed its name from the Sentinel Star to the Orlando Sentinel, a move designed to give the paper better name identification with the area it serves. The company also introduced Bonus, an advertising tabloid that is distributed in surrounding communities. Circulation during the first six months prior to March, 1982, of the Orlando Sentinel was 223,786, compared to 215,015 for the previous year.

The Fort Lauderdale News and Sun-Sentinel have completed the merger of its two staffs and raised ad rates, which helped to make the company profitable for 1982, says Tribune Co.

In the entertainment field, the broadcast holdings continue to yield profits while the investments in cable tv and the Chicago Cubs have yet to show black ink. "At the Movies," the Tribune Co.'s syndicated review show with Gene Siskel and Roger Ebert as hosts, proved popular with viewers and is now on 140 stations. The show will begin a second season in September. Operating revenues for the three groups increased 24% to $206 million, and operating profits were $25.5 million, a 6% decrease from 1981's totals.

Because of increases in advertising rates, Chicago's WGN-TV, New York's WPIX-TV and Denver's KWGN contributed to the rise in broadcast revenues.

The company will continue to search out broadcast properties. In April it acquired independent WGNO-TV, New Orleans, for an estimated $21 million. The purchase is still awaiting FCC approval.

Tribune Co. expanded its position in cable tv via its subsidiary the Tribune Cable Communications, giving it full or partial ownership in 10 holdings. Tribune Cable was awarded franchises in Tampa, Fla.; Lakewood, Cal.; Springfield, Mass. (30% owned); Oakland, Cal. (50% owned); Owatonna, Minn. (50% owned) and Milwaukie, Ore. (50% owned).

It is currently vying for contracts in California, Maryland and Michigan.

Rivalry smolders in smalltown skirmish

By Edward Morris

Rival newspapers in Cookeville, Tenn., don't go at each other with bull-whips in the town square, but they do practice a kind of frontier journalism reminiscent of the fourth estate in its more venomous days.

Cookeville is a college and farming community lying along Interstate Hwy. 40 about 80 miles east of Nashville. With a population of only slightly more than 20,000, Cookeville has the distinction of being the smallest town in the U.S. to still have competing daily newspapers. The morning Dispatch is owned locally by the Williams family, while the afternoon Herald-Citizen is a part of the Austin, Tex.-based Walls Newspapers chain.

Management at the Herald-Citizen accuses the opposition of inflating its circulation figures, varying its ad rates and doing a generally bad job of presenting news. It also says that the Dispatch aims itself at the lowest denominator of readership and shirks its responsibilities as a corporate citizen.

Not surprisingly, the principals of the Dispatch scoff at these charges and, for their part, assert that the Herald-Citizen is a pawn of outside interests. They argue that the rival paper devotes too little space to local events and gives too little editorial support to new and expanding businesses in the area.

Beyond the claims and counterclaims, there's also a bare-knuckle quality to the competition for Cookeville's limited ad dollars.

"We have a superior product in every way," boasts Joe Albrecht, the lanky, easy-going publisher of the Herald-Citizen. "We have more circulation than they do—paid.... But we are continually waging the battle to recoup ad accounts they take away from us because of their ability as salesmen." Fundamental to their sales pitch, he declares, are exaggerated circulation figures.

Mr. Albrecht, who has been publisher since 1976, admits it is common for his paper to lose a store's advertising account to the Dispatch any time the store gets a manager from out of town who is unfamiliar with both papers. Usually, he says, these straying accounts return. As a case in point, he cites the Herald-Citizen's loss of the Rose's discount store advertising for "three or four months." Now, he reports, the account is back.

"The only major accounts we haven't gone through this trauma with," Mr. Albrecht notes, "are J.C. Penney and Harvey's [a department store]."

The contentiousness extends to talk about numbers. In 1980, as a direct response to the Dispatch's circulation claims, the Herald-Citizen went to Audit Bureau of Circulations-verified statistics. For the six month period ending March 31, 1983, ABC figures show the Herald-Citizen average daily circulation at 10,119 and its Sunday average at 10,156. The Dispatch gives its comparable—but undocumented—numbers at 12,000 and 13,000, respectively.

GOOD MORNING FRIDAY
THE DISPATCH

"Our people know we're not liars," says Mr. Albrecht's adversary, Osia Williams, the red-haired, chain-smoking matriarch of the Dispatch publishing clan. Mrs. Williams' energy level would shame a wolverine, and she regards her competition with olympian condescension: "We do not stoop to talk about our competitors," she says. "We don't have time. We're too busy hustling."

Nobody hustles like Osia (pronounced o-shuh) Williams and her minions. She started the Dispatch 20 years ago as a free-distribution weekly and turned it into a formidable opponent of a newspaper that had been a Cookeville institution since 1903. To make her paper go, she abandoned the dress shop she had owned and operated and, with the help of her then 19-year-old son, Pat, learned to write news stories, take and print pictures and sell ads at rates she could only guess were proper.

Three years into the venture, Mrs. Williams hired veteran newsman Bill Austin as her editorial point man. He is still with the company and now helps guide not only the Dispatch but also four Williams family weeklies in adjacent counties.

The statistics the Dispatch does provide come from a hodgepodge of sources. Some, on comparative circulation, date back to 1977. Although Pat Williams is no longer the newspaper's publisher—he is now a marketing adviser—one hand-out reads: "Pat Williams is the publisher of the Dispatch; he's the only publisher this newspaper has ever had. He's not subject to being replaced by someone shuffled in from somewhere else in some complicated corporate game of musical chairs."

But innuendo and name-calling are not the exclusive province of the Dispatch. Charles Denning, executive editor of the Herald-Citizen routinely refers to the competition as "Dogpatch" and self-serving handler of the news.

"Ever since they've converted to a morning paper," he says, "they've picked up off the wire those stories about big urban afternoon dailies that have failed and put them on page one—for readers here in Putnam County who've hardly even heard of those cities, much less of the newspapers."

Mr. Albrecht conjectures that the Dispatch's switch to morning distribution in June, 1979, hurt its circulation, because it failed to take into account the working-class nature of Cookeville: "We're a blue-collar community to a great degree. Our people go to work at seven or eight in the morning. In the evening is when they read the paper."

Pat Williams says the Dispatch has two marketing techniques: Presenting the news in a brief and easily readable form and using lots of graphics, especially color and pictures of children.

Adds Mr. Austin: "My conception of the news is that if two people are interested in something, it's news. That's why we like to run stories about people —or about the biggest cabbage head or whatever. Consequently, we may not be as sophisticated as some papers. We don't want to be. We just try to be decent."

"Pat talked us into doing a little more national news once," Mrs. Williams recalls, "and, my God, it like to ruin us."

There is no question that the Dispatch is a superior picture paper. A school event that might merit a paragraph in a large daily or a picture and caption in the Herald-Citizen could easily wind up a as a two-page spread in the Dispatch.

The Herald-Citizen makes its bid for readership via a mix of news that is light on national and state stories and heavy on local ones. But it also has a variety of syndicated political commentaries and advice columns by top name writers, daily comic strips and an eight-page section of color comics on Sunday.

The Herald-Citizen, according to Mr. Albrecht, promotes itself most successfully through its own free-circulation shopper, Plus, which is published each Wednesday and mailed to nonsubscribers in the home county and three surrounding counties. Total circulation to advertisers who buy both the Plus and Herald-Citizen amounts to "a little over 36,000," Mr. Albrecht says.

Neither paper is unionized. The Herald-Citizen prints every day but Saturday and the Dispatch every day except Monday and Saturday. Yearly subscriptions are $18 for the Dispatch and $36 for the Herald-Citizen.

As media saturated as Cookeville may be, Mrs. Williams says that newspaper brokers have "worried us to death to buy the Dispatch. In the last five years, we've been approached 30 or 40 times." She asserts that she would not sell under any circumstances.

Thus do the battle lines stay drawn.

"I'm opposed philosophically to the concept of negative selling," Mr. Albrecht proclaims, "but I couldn't see we had any other choice. We try to do it rather sparingly with advertisers because it does come across as sour grapes. It's one of those judgment calls. We found that when we don't do it, we get hurt —and when we do do it, we get hurt less often."

Turner Broadcasting System

Turner Broadcasting System, Atlanta, is the nation's 61st largest media company with 1982 media revenues of $146.3 million, 88% of total revenues of $165.6 million. In 1981, it had media revenues of $83.0 million, 87% of total revenues of $95.1 million.

TBS wound up 1982 with profitable third and fourth quarters after budget trimming at Cable News Network and CNN Headline News, but the year in its entirety came in with a $3.3 million net loss, a much improved decline from the $13.4 million of red ink in 1981.

Sportsman-cable entrepreneur Ted Turner, who owns 86% of this mushrooming company, continued to keep the industry guessing with his on-again, off-again flirtations with merger or co-venture partners.

There were discussions with all three of the conventional tv networks, ABC, CBS and NBC, about various combinations of business interests as the father of superstationing and 24-hour tv network news wondered if small independent companies could prosper after being battered by the impact of the galloping trend toward bigness.

WTBS, the world's first superstation, remains the foundation of the Turner empire.

Available in more than 25.8 million homes across 49 states, the Atlanta station marketed its classic movies, off-network reruns and sports adroitly enough to sponsors to gross $96.6 million in ad revenues, a striking gain over the previous year's billings of $55.3 million. The Turner sales troops pulled off this feat during an economic slump and a disappointing period for cable ad revenues. The station had a $31.1 million profit.

Mr. Turner pleaded with Congress to stave off the copyright royalty increases that he said would threaten the future growth of WTBS. But even when operators were forced to pay copyright fee increases of up to 500%, WTBS, the most profitable advertiser-supported cable tv programing service, lost relatively little of its cable circulation.

Returns from the Turner sports franchises, the Atlanta baseball Braves and the basketball Hawks, 96% owned by Turner through a limited partnership, are excluded from this media breakout.

However, both deserve a share of the credit for WTBS' success with viewers and advertisers.

The rest of WTBS' media revenues came from CNN and CNN Headline News; news grossed $49.7 million in 1982 and $27.7 million in 1981 before the start up of the quickie news service. This includes ad revenues as well as income from cable operators who are charged a monthly per-home fee. As their contracts come up for renewal, many of the bigger multiple systems operators are insisting that they will no longer pay for networks from the satellites because there are so many free, advertiser-supported services available to them.

In 1982, Bonnie Cook, vp of J. C. Bradford & Co., an analyst who follows this company closely, estimated that CNN lost $6.4 million and CNN Headline News lost $10 million. She predicts that CNN I, available to 19.2 million households, will yield a profit of perhaps $7 million, while losses at the newer service will remain the same, resulting in a net loss of $3 million for the news operations in 1983.

United Cable Television Corp.

United Cable Television Corp., Denver, the nation's 81st largest media company, reported revenues of $99.8 million and operating income of $35.9 million in fiscal 1982, all in media.

The publicly held company continued its upward movement the first three quarters of fiscal 1983, which ended May 31, reporting $110.8 million in revenues and $33.4 million in operating income.

The company estimates yearend revenues to exceed $150 million and operating income to top $45 million.

United Cable increased its homes passed in 1982 to 825,000, compared with 752,820 in fiscal 1981. Company officials projected they would exceed 1 million homes passed in fiscal 1983. It currently has 1.6 million homes under franchise. By the end of its fiscal year, May 31, the company expected more than 570,000 subscribers and 34 fully operational franchises.

Most of the increase is attributable to the company's addition of new franchises including Alameda, Cal.; Hacienda Heights and South Whittier, Cal., and Vernon, Conn. The company, in partnership with Tribune Cable, also has been granted franchises in Oakland County, Mich., and Montgomery County, Md. United Cable and the Tribune Co. also have been negotiating for a franchise in Sacramento, Cal.

United Cable is seeking other companies with which to form limited private partnerships to help finance the construction and initial operation of systems. It recently arranged to have TA & Associates provide $10 million in equity to construct a system in Scottsdale, Ariz. The company has, however, ceased bidding for other new franchises.

United Cable also hopes to generate additional revenues by introducing small-scale advertising in some of its cable systems. The company's Tulsa, Okla., franchise (the only United Cable cable tv operation that takes advertising) was expected to have generated $1 million in ad revenues as of May 31, 1983. United Cable's franchises outstanding, representing 204,300 homes and $85 million in estimated construction costs, are East San Fernando Valley and West Covina, Cal., and Bloomfield Hills (suburban Detroit). The company also is in the process of building in the Denver suburbs as well as Scottsdale, where portions of the systems already are operating.

The company anticipates having 100,000 subscribers in suburban Denver and 43,500 subscribers in Scottsdale by the end of the calendar year.

There are lawsuits and appeals still outstanding in a challenge by local United Cable shareholders to the awarding of the Denver city franchise to Mile Hi Cablevision. United Cable has offered to buy back stock from local shareholders. Fred Vierra, president of United Cable, said there is no remote hope of getting the Denver franchise.

United Cable's tri-city stv operation, Home Entertainment Network, lost 27 cents a share or a total of about $3 million in the company's third quarter—the most for any single quarter so far.

The company has laid off employes and generally tightened stv operations in Cincinnati, Chicago and Minneapolis, which have a total of about 100,000 subscribers who pay an average $24 per month. There are no plans to cutback on programing or the number of hours on the air.

However, Home Entertainment recently signed an agreement with Oak Industries to carry its satellite programing service to subscribers in Cincinnati and Minneapolis that began June 1.

U.S. News & World Report

U.S. News & World Report, Washington, which is celebrating its 50th anniversary this year, is the nation's 70th largest media company, with 1982 revenues from media properties estimated by Advertising Age of $124.0 million, or 94% of total revenues of $132.0 million.

In 1981, the company had estimated revenues of $107.2 million, also 94% of $114.0 million. Media revenues come from the flagship magazine, newsletters, radio programing and electronic publisher services.

Continued growth is anticipated for 1983, according to president James McIlhenny, who projects 1983 media revenues to approximate $136.0 million out of total gross revenues of $151.0 million.

Part of the reason for that anticipated growth lies in the company's venture into electronic publisher services through its Publishers Services International (PSI), which Mr. McIlhenny says is "the fastest-growing portion of our business."

The subsidiary, formed in 1981, provides computer-based editorial services, such as transmission services and computer typesetting, to an increasing number of customers. PSI has sales commitments of more than $10 million annually, and Mr. McIlhenny said it should expand its capabilities in 1984 into four-color transmission and increased satellite access.

He envisions the subsidiary comprising 35% of the corporation's revenues over the next five years.

According to the Publishers Information Bureau (PIB), U.S. News' total ad pages dropped 3% as the gross ad revenues increased 5% to $83.8 million. The slight improvement in the overall economy seems to be helping the magazine so far this year. PIB reports U.S. News' ad pages up 2% and revenues up 11% for the first calendar quarter.

Viacom International

Viacom International, New York, is the country's 41st largest media company, with media revenues of $228.6 million, about 83% of total revenues of $274.9 million. In 1981, its media revenues were $164.5 million, about 78% of total revenues of $210.4 million.

The cable-broadcast-entertainment company boosted its total revenues 31% in 1981, and earnings climbed 30% to $24.5 million.

Defined as media businesses for the purpose of this analysis were the radio-tv station group and the multiple systems cable operation. Excluded are the expanding cable-tv-movie theater program distribution and production activities.

The growing broadcast group of three tv and eight radio stations forged ahead of cable as the family's largest revenue producer although the mso continued to lead in the earnings-from-operations column. Viacom's own stations, run as a group under the direction of Paul Hughes, chalked up their best year in revenues and profits, according to the annual report.

Revenues for WVIT-TV, New Britain/Hartford, Conn., and WNYT-TV, Albany, N.Y., and radio stations in Oakland, Chicago, New York, Memphis, Houston and Washington climbed to $115.7 million from $83.5 million the previous year. Returns from Showtime, the country's No. 2 premium pay network, with 6 million subscribers, are reported as a part of broadcast services revenues. Earnings from operations for the broadcast segment were almost double the preceding year's at $13.9 million.

At the last annual meeting, Viacom chairman Ralph Baruch, a onetime broadcast executive at CBS, promised the stockholders the company "will continue to pursue radio and tv properties for possible acquisition, where appropriate." The third tv station, KSLA-TV, Shreveport, La., was bought early in 1983 in a $29.9 million stock swap.

The cable division, with John Goddard as president, reported revenues of $112.8 million, compared to $85.1 million in 1981. Its earnings from operations climbed nearly $4 million to $19.3 million.

The revenues came from fees from more than 600,000 basic and upwards of 470,000 premium pay cable subscribers in seven states.

A record for the most lavish list of program choices was set in Milwaukee's suburbs, where a 108-channel system went into operation. But the Milwaukee city council chose Warner Amex over Viacom to wire the inner city. Later Viacom launched a 120-channel system in Mountain View, Cal.

Viacom has not been as aggressive in battling for virgin franchise territory in heavily populated centers as Warner Amex, Cablevision and other rival msos. Viacom had been a leading contender to wire Multnomah County, Ore., but withdrew in late 1982.

However, Viacom has been in the forefront of selling cable time to advertisers and in developing two-way interactive systems to offer pay per view (ppv) schedules. Mr. Baruch predicts that ppv will be a $5 billion business by the end of the decade.

A recent addition to the corporate chart is the Cable Health Network, an advertiser-supported 24-hour specialized service introduced last year on Satcom 3R. And just this month, Viacom and Hearst/ABC Video Services agreed in principle to merge services. The new service would be called Hearst/ABC-Viacom Entertainment Services. Viacom would own a third of the operation, and the number of subscribers would be boosted substantially, which could lead to having at least 15 million subscribers, the number most rating services require before taking audience measurements.

The nonmedia programing activities, all managed together under the entertainment group, include Viacom Enterprises and Viacom Productions. Viacom Enterprises claims the title of "the world's largest independent distributor of tv programing."

Viacom had owned 50% of Showtime with Teleprompter. After Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. merged with Teleprompter, Viacom bought the rest for $75 million.

Steps are in motion to combine Showtime and Warner Amex's Movie Channel into a joint venture capable of mounting a serious challenge to the dominance of Time Inc.'s Home Box Office. If this is realized, Viacom's partners will be MCA-Universal, Paramount Pictures and Warner Amex.

Warner Communications

Warner Communications, New York, is the country's 50th largest media company, with media property revenues estimated by Advertising Age at $183.8 million, or 5% of total revenues of $3.98 billion in 1982. Warner had estimated media revenues of $110.5 million in 1981, or 3% of total revenues of $3.24 billion.

The worldwide communications and entertainment conglomerate drew media revenues from its 50% share in Warner Amex (a joint cable venture with American Express Co.) and from E.C. Publications ("Mad" magazine) and DC Comics in its publishing division.

Last year was some year for Warner Communications. Steven J. Ross, chairman and chief executive officer, speaking to shareholders, labeled it "disappointing." To wit:

- Some of Warner's executives were found guilty of embezzlement.
- Fourth-quarter earnings plummeted, as did the stock.
- Big money was lost in its Atari division, as the electronic games industry started to suffer the early stages of shakeout.
- After five years of trying to turn it around, the company sold off some of its Knickerbocker Toy company to Hasbro.

Other snags: Warner toyed with the idea of acquiring the United Artists Music Co. and Warner Bros.' pre-1950 film library from MGM/UA for an estimated $95 million, but negotiations were never consummated; it tried to sell 25% of Movie Channel shares to Universal Studios and Paramount Pictures, but those dealings didn't work out either; it planned a test last fall of its proposed new shopping service, Shop America, but it has been shelved until the end of 1983; last summer the corporation was faced with a suit as a result of an accident that killed actor Vic Morrow and two children on the location of the "Twilight Zone" feature film.

The litany continues: News broke out that American Express was unhappy and was looking for a third partner in the company's Warner-Amex venture—talk that American Express and Warner denied. It tinkered with the idea of buying Madison Fund, but when its stock plunged, it abandoned that idea.

Then last November in the criminal trial of Warner's assistant treasurer, Solomon Weiss, a federal prosecutor linked chairman/ceo Mr. Ross to a secret cash fund allegedly created in connection with Warner's purchase of stock in the now-defunct Westchester Premier Theatre in Tarrytown, N.Y. Mr. Ross denied any wrongdoing. Mr. Weiss was found guilty. Earlier, Jay Emmett, onetime officer of Warner's three-man president's office, pleaded guilty to charges he took cash bribes in return for inducing Warner to buy the theater stock. Leonard Horowitz, who worked at Warner as a sales executive after working as an officer of Westchester Premier, was convicted of stock fraud and obstruction of justice as a result of his participation in the dealings. Later, all three Warner ex-officials received suspended sentences. All in all, the year 1982 is unquestionably one Warner Communications would just as soon forget.

It had its brighter moments, however. Last June, Warner announced a deal between its Atari unit and Lucasfilm (as in "Star Wars," "Raiders of the Lost Ark") to make videogames and other home entertainment products. The company also signed a three-year contract with CBS Theatrical Films to distribute the films produced by the CBS division.

Warner continues to operate on the basic strategy that "presumes that consumers around the world will continue to devote a substantial, and in many cases a growing, portion of their income to 'entertainment,'" said Mr. Ross.

Even with all its problems, Warner came out ahead for the year. Net income of $258 million was up 14% over the net rung up in 1981. Revenues also increased from $3.2 billion to $4 billion. Both income and revenues hit new alltime highs.

The joint venture, which consists of Warner Amex Cable Communications and Warner Amex Satellite Entertainment Co., produced total revenues of $307.6 million, an impressive 74% gain over 1981. However, the division also suffered a net loss of $46.6 million, a loss attributed to "substantial costs associated with the simultaneous building and development of a number of new Warner Amex cable systems and the marketing of new WASEC cable programing services," according to the company.

WASEC, which ranks as the largest supplier of programing for cable tv, is expected to go into the black in 1984. To help achieve that end, Warner brought in Drew Lewis, former Secretary of Transportation, to be the new chairman-ceo of the joint venture, succeeding Gustave M. Hauser, 53, now a consultant to Warner Amex.

Despite its dip in the red, the company remains confident the "venture will become a major source of earnings to the company within a few years," Mr. Ross wrote. Bob Pittman, senior vp-programing at WASEC, predicted that by 1985 revenues from pay tv could "very well equal or surpass" revenues from theatrical film rentals. The company added 11 new franchises in 1982, bringing its total number of homes under franchise to more than 3.8 million. It added 291,000 basic subscribers and 460,000 pay subscriptions. It also made progress last year building QUBE systems in Chicago, Cincinnati, Dallas, Houston, Pittsburgh and suburban sections of St. Louis.

While it lost out in its bid for the contract in Sacramento, Cal., Warner Amex entered final contract negotiations with Milwaukee to build a 108-channel system covering 240,000 homes and is negotiating with New York franchises for sections of Queens and Brooklyn, with nearly 500,000 homes.

Last year Warner Amex created Home Sports Entertainment Channels in Dallas, Houston and Pittsburgh, signing long-term contracts for exclusive cable coverage of Houston Astros and Pittsburgh Pirates baseball games. Warner Amex Satellite Entertainment Co.'s The Movie Channel went out to 2.2 million subscribers in 1982, while the company sweetened the pie to cable operators, paying them $10 a head for each new subscriber gained by affiliates who signed a five-year contract.

Warner's 24-hour station, MTV: Music Television, became available in an estimated 9 million cable homes, four times as many as the previous year. Nickelodeon, WASEC's children's network, is now beaming out to more than 10 million households.

Washington Post Co.

Washington Post Co., Washington, is the country's 13th largest media company, with 1982 media revenues of $786.2 million, or 98% of a reported total $801.4 million in operating revenue for the year. Media revenues for the publicly held company were up 6.3%, or $46.7 million, from 1981's $739.5 million (restated by AA).

With the sale in 1981 of two money-losing ventures, the Trenton (N.J.) Times newspaper and Inside Sports magazine, Post company balance sheets strengthened last year, and the trend continued through 1983's first quarter. Profitability has rebounded, and the company is building cash reserves just as new top management—brought aboard in 1981 and 1982—begins making its first investment moves to expand the company's role in "the information industry."

The company earned $52.4 million last year, a 60% gain over 1981, when combined losses at the Trenton papers and Inside Sports were $13 million. Over the year its stock price tripled, from about $20 to $60 a share. In 1983's first quarter, net income was 21% higher than the comparable 1982 performance.

The Post company said its 1982 operating revenue of $801 million, including the $14.6 million from sources other than advertising and circulation, was generated as follows: Newspaper publishing, including the Everett (Wash.) Herald, $413.9 million, or 52%; magazines, $279.2 million, or 35%, and broadcasting, $107.7 million, or 13%.

Washington Post Co. president Richard D. Simmons, former vice-chairman of Dun & Bradstreet, has intrigued outside observers with his initial strategic moves: Pursuit of government licenses to operate new cellular radio mobile telephone services in 11 markets; acquisition of a small, Washington-oriented electronic "data base publisher," Legi-Slate, and the purchase of interests in two regional cable tv sports networks, SportsChannel Associates in the New York market and New England SportsChannel.

But these remain frills, albeit with interesting future prospects. The real sinew of the Post company remains the flagship Washington Post, Newsweek and the company's network-affiliated tv stations in Detroit, Miami, Hartford, Conn., and Jacksonville, Fla.

Company executives this spring predicted a "strong" 1983 for the Washington Post. The 1983 outlook for Newsweek, where ad pages, revenue and income were down in 1982, is "guarded optimism." Its Post-Newsweek unit, with four tv stations, should have an "excellent" 1983, the company said.

Mr. Simmons said the company is still interested in acquiring "major market" newspapers and tv stations, large magazines that are established and of "high quality" and well managed cable tv systems in large metropolitan areas. But prices have been "extremely high," Mr. Simmons has said, "and therefore generally cannot produce the returns on investment we require."

In its core businesses, the Post company has moved ahead with a daring redesign of Newsweek, engineered by new editor-in-chief William Broyles Jr., until last year the editor of Texas Monthly and California magazines. The new Newsweek is differentiating itself from category leader Time with more in-depthfeature cover stories, taking space away from its traditional weekly digest of major news events.

The company is also actively pursuing growth through "product line extensions." Five issues of Newsweek on Campus, a new demographic issue of Newsweek, are planned for 1983. Equipped with special editorial, the edition has a paid circulation rate base of 400,000 with another 425,000 copies distributed as inserts in major college and university newspapers. Newsweek Woman, a monthly demographic edition introduced in 1980, and Newsweek Executive Plus, a 900,000-base circulation twice-monthly edition introduced last year, are other line extensions.

Instead of pushing its regular edition nationally, the Washington Post has been given the green light to launch its own "line extension" this fall: A weekly spinoff publication, the Washington Post National Weekly Edition. It is a tabloid compendium of the most important articles and essays on government, politics and the economy that appeared in the previous week's daily Post. Designed for an out-of-town audience, it will be primarily distributed through mail subscriptions. It has an initial circulation target of around 30,000.

An outstanding editorial success, the Washington Post continues to demonstrate its commercial power as well. The recession's bite showed up in a 1.5% decline in Post ad linage in 1982, and linage in 1983's first quarter slipped 6% below comparable 1982 figures. But ad rate hikes passed through in early 1982 and again in early 1983 more than offset the volume slip: Post ad revenues climbed 15.6% to $304.7 million in 1982. Circulation revenue, reflecting in part the switch of Star readers to the Post, climbed 23% to $88.5 million. Over-all revenues in the newspaper division have continued to climb. In the first quarter of 1983, revenues were up 6% over the comparable 1982 quarter—figures include the Everett Herald.

At Newsweek, circulation reached a record 3.01 million in 1982, but ad pages in the domestic edition fell to 2,846 from 3,106 in 1981; ad pages in the international edition fell to 2,546 from 2,614.

Westinghouse Electric Corp.

Westinghouse Electric Corp., Pittsburgh, is the country's 16th largest media company, with revenues of $663.0 million from its broadcasting and cable operations in 1982. Media represented 7% of total Westinghouse sales of $9.75 billion.

In 1981 Westinghouse had media revenues of $319.0 million or 3% of total Westinghouse Electric sales of $9.37 billion. Media revenues more than doubled for the company, largely because of it includes TelePrompTer's first full year of operation.

Westinghouse actions during the year fueled speculation that it may be backing away from the highly competitive market for pay-tv networks: It pulled out of Disney Channel, its scheduled joint pay tv venture with Walt Disney Productions; it sold its remaining half interest in Showtime, another pay-tv joint venture, for $75 million to the previous half-partner Viacom International.

Daniel L. Ritchie, chairman and chief executive officer of Westinghouse Broadcasting and Cable, and Jonathan Hayes, president of Group W Satellite Communications, said the company still had a commitment to the programing side of cable tv.

Westinghouse executives indicated that they were uncertain that Disney's formula for its channel would work in the marketplace. Group W also appeared to be skeptical concerning Disney's plan to take over programing and marketing decisions for the Disney Channel. Mr. Ritchie said that in principle, Group W did not believe the Disney Channel should be dominated by the studio. "We were unwilling to invest the $75 million to $100 million we would have had to get it moving."

Group W also put Satellite News Channel II, scheduled to get off the ground this year, on hold because of the economy. SNC II was to feature a more in-depth treatment of the news as opposed to SNC I, which airs shorter stories.

A major management move took place when M. Christopher Derick, president and chief operating officer of Group W Cable, resigned over what he called "philosophical differences." Mr. Derick was replaced by Burton B. Staniar, a senior vp, whose background is customer service and marketing.

Wometco Enterprises

Wometco Enterprises, Miami, is the country's 59th largest media company, with revenues of $155.5 million from media operations in 1982, or 32% of total revenues of $493.4 million. Media revenues increased 27% from 1981 media revenues of $122.7 million.

Broadcasting accounted for $74.1 million in revenues, or 15% of total revenues, while cable and subscription tv combined for revenues of $81.5 million, or 16.5% of total.

Net income rose 7% last year to $26 million and, like total revenues, was the highest in Wometco's 58-year history. In addition to media operations, the publicly held company also operates soft drink bottling, vending and entertainment divisions.

Wometco confidently predicted a better year in 1983, particularly in broadcasting, with an improved advertising climate, according to Gerry Whaley, vp-public affairs. Wometco owns and operates six tv stations, including four vhf outlets.

The major portion of Wometco's cable tv activities are conducted by an 85%-owned subsidiary, Wometco Cable TV, which has in operation or under construction 46 cable systems in 155 franchised communities. It is the 22nd largest multiple system operator in the country, with 235,000 basic subscribers, a 17% increase over 1981.

Premium/pay-tv subscriptions rose 22% during the year, to 197,000, while homes passed climbed 17%, to 417,000. (These figures do not include the 6,000 subscribers served by Wometco Enterprises' system in Freeport, Bahamas.)

Cable holdings will receive particular emphasis in 1983, Mr. Whaley said.

Cable expansion efforts include a constant search to obtain new branches and the acquisition of other cable companies, Mr. Whaley said, as well as laying miles of new cable.

Also targeted for attention in 1983 is Wometco Home Theatre (WHT), a subscription television service providing over-the-air pay tv since 1977. By the end of 1982, WHT was still not showing a profit.

Worrell Newspapers

Worrell Newspapers, a privately owned company based in Charlottesville, Va., is the country's 99th largest media company, with 1982 revenues estimated by Advertising Age at $67.4 million. All the company's holdings, which include three tv stations, are media properties.

Like most companies wrestling with the ups and downs of print, Worrell had mixed results in 1982. Revenues increased only about 7% for the properties Worrell had retained by the end of the year.

Over-all revenues were down from 1981's estimated $84.0 million figure because of the sale of approximately 25% of its print properties to the New York Times Co.

Worrell last year also acquired three "county seat weeklies," papers serving local government centers.

Three other weeklies, with a combined circulation of 20,000, were sold: York County Coast Star, Kennebunk, Me.; Banner Independent, Booneville, Miss., and Claiborne Progress, New Tazewell, Tenn.

These eight dailies were sold: Middlesboro (Ky.) Daily News, Corinth (Miss.) Daily Corinthian, Florence Times/Tri-Cities (Ala.) Daily, Harlan (Ky.) Daily Enterprise, Madisonville (Ky.) Messenger, Lenoir (N.C.) News Topic, Dyersburg (Tenn.) State Gazette and Opelousas (La.) Daily World.

Combined circulation for the divested dailies stands at 90,000. Largest daily sold was the Florence Times/Tri-Cities Daily, with a circulation of 29,000. All these properties now belong to the New York Times Co.

On the acquisition side of the ledger, Worrell bought three weeklies, all in Virginia, last year: Orange County Review, Greene County Record and Madison County Eagle.

WEST VIRGINIA: Princeton Times.

Ziff Corp.

Ziff Corp., New York, is the country's 26th largest media company, with media property revenues estimated by Advertising Age at $320.2 million in 1982. Media revenues in 1981 were estimated at $300.0 million. Total revenues for Ziff, a privately held company, were not available.

Over the last decade, Ziff, which was known primarily for special-interest magazines, has vaulted onto unfamiliar turf—and lived to regret it. In 1982 the company sold its operations in two of those new areas, tv stations and Wharton Econometric Forecasting Associates.

Ziff's foray into database publishing was particularly disappointing. Wharton was to have been only the first in a long line of database, economic forecasting operations that would compete with the likes of Data Resources and Chase Econometrics, but the projects fell into relatively quick disarray.

At first, William Ziff Jr., head of the company, reportedly threw himself into the database unit, hiring a new executive cadre to staff the operations. However, various technological and related snafus ultimately sabotaged Wharton's ability to deliver data to its customers. An additional problem, other sources said, lay in Mr. Ziff's gradual waning of interest in the medium.

The big 1982 newsmaker in the Ziff stable was Pschology Today. For quite some time, rumors had been circulating that the magazine would be sold. Despite fairly adamant and consistent corporate denials—or at the very least hemming and hawing—the magazine was indeed sold this past February to the American Psychological Assn. in Washington. The move came only three months after Ziff had begun a major campaign to resuscitate the publication.

Not long thereafter, however, the American Psychological Assn.—a Washington-based group representing 55,000 psychologists in the U.S., Canada and abroad, and publisher of a number of journals—did acquire the magazine.

Last month, Ziff-Davis Publishing agreed to sell assets and subscription lists of Camera Arts to CBS Inc.

If what developed at Ziff-Davis' PC magazine the first week of June becomes a trend at the company, 1983 revenues will indeed hit the roof. PC, aimed at owners of IBM's personal computers, issued a 642-page magazine that broke the record for the largest monthly consumer magazine set in September, 1981, by Vogue. Of the page totals, 384 were ad pages (PC had only 357 ad pages in its issue this April). The issue weighed 2.8 pounds and was an inch thick. PC was founded in February 1982. It sells for $2.95 and has a circulation of 130,000.

Pet foods up slightly

By JOHN C. MAXWELL JR.

The pet food industry moved up almost 7% in 1982 in dollars; however, the gain in units was much more modest.

Canned dog food increased nearly 4% in dollars and was down 2% to 3% in units. Dry dog food rose nearly 6% in dollars and 3% to 4% in units.

In the canned cat food area, dollar sales were up 13% with units up 2%. Moist dog food dropped 8% in dollar sales and was down 3% to 4% in units.

Dog snacks showed the best growth, with dollar sales up 17% and units up 7% to 8%.

Dry cat food was up over 11% in dollars and 5% in units, while moist cat food rose 10.5% in dollars and 2% in units.

It is interesting to note that all the major companies lost market share, with the biggest increase coming in the "all others" sector.

Generic brands continued as winners in the various areas, and generics now account for a meaningful portion of the market, particularly in dry dog food.#

Y&R's Perez and Kulok join FilmFair New York

NEW YORK—Manny Perez, the former Young & Rubicam producer-director whose credits include award-winning Hallmark, Dr Pepper and Lincoln-Mercury tv spots, has moved to the FilmFair New York production house with another award-winning Y&R veteran, director Scott Kulok. Mr. Kulok worked at Scali, McCabe, Sloves and Wells, Rich, Greene before joining Y&R.

Tara McCarthy, previously a free lance producer, continues as the executive producer at the FilmFair studio here. The Studio City, Cal.-based production company opened its Manhattan operation 18 months ago with Ms. McCarthy. Linda Wolff, formerly head of sales at N. Lee Lacy, has joined FilmFair New York as a sales rep. FilmFair has other facilities in Chicago and London.

Perks

premiums, travel, children's education, deferred compensation plans, low-interest loans, substantial severance settlements and, of course, retirement plans.

According to the contracts worked out by attorneys and accountants, some advertising executives can live the good life long after they have turned in the key to the executive sauna.

C. Goldschmidt

Although Mr. Goldschmidt is the only president of the publicly held shops pocketing his share of the profits, other agency chieftains do very well when all their benefits are added into the pot. For example, William Weithas, the 53-year-old chairman-chief executive officer of SSC&B, an Interpublic Group subsidiary, earns an annual salary of $220,000. Directors' fees, commissions and bonuses increase that to $337,717. Add to that $103,264 in securities or property, insurance benefits or reimbursement and personal benefits. Then add another $63,879 in what is termed "aggregate of contingent forms of remuneration." Total: $504,860.

As head of SSC&B: Lintas Worldwide, Mr. Weithas maintains a home in London. Of that $103,264 in securities or property, $78,757 goes into housing in the U.K., transportation, schooling for his children, relocation costs and "amounts necessary to equalize United Kingdom cost-of-living and tax liability." The company maintains the Weithas residence in London and also pays the family's education and transportation bills between the U.S. and the U.K.

A member of the Interpublic board, Mr. Weithas holds 3,000 shares of Interpublic common stock, held under IPG's restricted stock plan. That stock is selling for $57 a share (for a total investment of $171,000). In a note on the $63,879 in contingent forms of remuneration, the proxy report stated it includes "amortized costs of special retirement benefits payable to Mr. Weithas, approximately one-half of which is funded through a policy of insurance on Mr. Weithas' life having an annual premium of $20,000."

If Mr. Weithas and SSC&B part ways before June 30, 1987, for any reason other than his death, he will get deferred compensation at an annual rate of $40,000 for the time he worked since July 1, 1982. If he is ousted or quits between July 1, 1987, and June 30, 1992, he will take a "special retirement benefit ranging from $29,600 to $65,120 a year, based on the year of termination," for 10 years following his leaving. If he stops working at SSC&B (or IPG) on or after July 1, 1992, ("with or without the consent of the company") he gets $74,000 a year for a decade. If he should die while still employed by SSC&B, $74,000 a year will be paid for 10 years to his beneficiaries.

If Thomas B. Adams, 63, is not elected chairman of Campbell-Ewald and a member of the finance board or Interpublic's board, he may continue to work at the agency at the same ($265,000 a year) salary in a board-approved job or he can quit immediately and get "as liquidated damages, payments equivalent to his salary and such sum of money as would have been allocated to his account as a participant in Campbell-Ewald's profit sharing plan."

If Philip H. Geier Jr., 48, chairman of Interpublic, leaves or loses his job before his 55th birthday, he will get a deferred compensation of $50,000 a year for each year he worked since Jan. 1, 1983, to the date of departure. If his employment ends between his 55th and 60th birthdays (and he still is living), he will get a "special retirement benefit ranging from $84,000 to $112,800 per year" based on when the job ended for 10 years thereafter. And if he makes it to 60, IPG will pay him $120,000 a year for 10 years following the termination of employment. If he dies while still employed, his beneficiaries will receive $120,000 a year for a decade following his death.

Edward Meyer, 55, chairman of Grey Advertising and one of the more highly paid executives in the industry, has a contract that guarantees him a minimum of $475,000 annually for his work as chief executive officer. If the job doesn't work out, he will leave with $3 million "in consideration of his employment commitment and in recognition of his valuable services during his employment."

Grey also "defrays premiums on a $500,000 limited payment ordinary life insurance policy" on Mr. Meyer. In addition, he gets pension payments equal to 35% of his highest annual salary, subject to cost-of-living increases. "Such pension payments will commence on Mr. Meyer's attainment of age 55 in the case of termination by the company other than the cause or termination by Mr. Meyer with good reason, or the later of Mr. Meyer's attainment of age 60 or the termination of his fulltime employment as chief executive officer."

Carl Nichols, 59, chairman-chief executive officer, and Anthony Chevins, 61, president-chief operating officer of Cunningham & Walsh, another agency in the Mickelberry group, have agreements guaranteeing them annual salaries of no less than $250,000 a year through the end of 1986.

When Barry Loughrane, 50, accepted Doyle Dane Bernbach's invitation to be president of the agency, president-chief executive officer of DDB/U.S., he had to sell his house in Los Angeles and relocate to New York. In a depressed housing market, this could be a problem. It wasn't. Part of the deal was for DDB to "guarantee him against any loss from the approximate current market value of $300,000 on the sale of his house." He also took the job at an annual salary of $230,000.

Joseph Daly, 64, chairman of DDB until September, will get a minimum of $250,000 a year for the period ending Dec. 31, 1987. Nicolai von Dellingshausen, 50, president of DDB/Europe, has a contract that provides for a minimum annual salary of $160,000 and an apartment in London. In 1982, DDB lent Roy Grace, 46, chairman-executive creative director, $588,750 at an annual interest rate of 6%. The purpose of the loan was not reported.

Stockholdings add substantially to the booty. James Marlas, chairman of Mickelberry Corp., holds 1.3 million shares of company stock, a nice chunk of change at $10.75 a share. Mr. Goldschmidt owns 69,468 shares of Mickelberry. Tom Dillon, former chairman of BBDO, holds 332,500 shares, at an asked price of $43.25 a share (as of June 8). BBDO's Bruce Crawford holds 40,000 shares of BBDO stock, while Raymond McGovern, secretary-general counsel of the agency, owns 29,000 shares. To induce DDB's Neil Austrian to extend his contract at the agency, he was given 120,000 phantom common stock units. DDB is selling for $28.25, making Mr. Austrian's stock worth $3.4 million. Grey's Mr. Meyer owns 96,148 shares of Grey stock, which at $112 a share asked translates into an investment worth $10.8 million.

Agencies also can help ease the hassle that comes with moving about. When JWT moved Denis Lanigan to New York from London, the company became guarantor on a $402,400 bank loan to purchase a home in New York. It reimburses him for interest payments in excess of 7% on the principal amount of $302,400 and for all interest payments with respect to $100,000 of the principal. JWT also loaned Herbert Eames, chief financial officer, $350,000 at an interest rate of 12.6% to buy a new home.#

Meyer benefits spark protest

New York—This shareholder had had enough. After reading through Grey Advertising's proxy statement, Rod Bate, a portfolio manager with Cranford Co., Ho-Ho-Kus, N.J., was outraged. He contained himself until last week, when he attended Grey's annual shareholder meeting here and voiced his objection to the $1 million annual compensation package that goes to Grey chairman-president Edward H. Meyer.

E. Meyer

The chairman defended himself by pointing out that when he took the job, stock was selling for a paltry $7 a share, a far cry from today's $105 price.

Mr. Bate went on to criticize the so-called "golden parachute" agreements that are designed to soften the blow for top executives when things go wrong or their company is sold. And he was rather burned up by the cushiony pension plans afforded top-level management. "I don't mind a reasonable severance pay, but here they're setting people up for life," Mr. Bate said. According to the 1982 Grey proxy, "certain qualified executive officers of the executive vice-president level or senior will be entitled upon their retirement at or after age 60 to a lifetime supplemental pension of $50,000 per year." In 1981, 13 Grey executives participated in that plan.#

THOMAS HECK

New York—Thomas Heck, 58, who left Wells, Rich, Greene in May to join Ted Bates Advertising as executive creative director, died June 22 in New York Hospital after suffering a heart attack.

At WRG, Mr. Heck served for the past 10 years as a creative group head. He worked on Black Velvet Canadian whisky, "I Love New York," National Airlines, Benson & Hedges, Yardley and Procter & Gamble.

When Mr. Heck and Nancy Vaughn, another WRG senior creative exec, joined Bates (AA, May 2), their move was seen as an important part of Bates' effort to adjust its famous Unique Selling Proposition creative concept to a contemporary level.

During his advertising career, Mr. Heck served as an art director at Young & Rubicam and Marschalk Co., moved to McCann-Erickson as a senior art director, then in 1961 joined Ladies' Home Journal as an art director. After resigning over disagreements on editorial policy, Mr. Heck joined Johnstone Inc. and later joined the F. William Free agency as exec vp-co-creative director.#

Soft drink group wary

Delay sought on aspartame

By NANCY GIGES and ROBERT REED

The National Soft Drink Assn. is expected this week to ask the Food & Drug Administration to delay its approval of the sweetener aspartame for use within carbonated beverages.

Industry sources report that NSDA will send a letter to the FDA requesting a stay of the regulatory agency's recently announced approval (AA, July 4).

The action underscores the ongoing concern major soft-drink companies have about the new sweetener and suggests it will be a while before it is incorporated into product lines, say industry executives.

Delaying approval will directly affect Skokie, Ill.-based G.D. Searle & Co., which holds the exclusive patent on aspartame and on aspartame mixtures with the current ingredient in diet sodas, saccharin.

NSDA officials said last week no letter was being prepared and that at that time no further action was being considered, according to a spokesman.

But Robert Shapiro, president of Searle's NutraSweet group, said his company expects the NSDA to ask for a delay. Mr.

FTC to court: Stop B&W ads

By RICHARD L. GORDON

WASHINGTON—After two years of indecisive legal jousting, Brown & Williamson Tobacco's fight to keep Barclay's 1mg ultralow-tar rating in its ad battle for market share has been dumped in the lap of U.S. district court Judge Gerhard Gesell.

Bypassing time-consuming administrative law routines, the Federal Trade Commission last week asked Judge Gesell for a preliminary injunction which, if granted, would put an immediate stop to the lmg tar, "99% tar free" advertising claims.

That has been the key selling point in Barclay's rise since 1980 as a major contender in the ultralow-tar cigaret category.

In a parallel action, FTC asked the six cigaret companies for advice on improved testing procedures that would more accurately measure tar delivery by B&W's unique Actron filter, which is used on Barclay and on the company's Kool Ultra brand.

Its decision to go directly to Judge Gesell was influenced, in part, by conflict-of-interest issues which would be created if it were judging Barclay's ads while also functioning in its legislative role to

PM's Morgan heads to Atari

SUNNYVALE, CAL.—Warner Communications has reached out for an executive with savvy in mass marketing to direct its troubled Atari electronics subsidiary.

James J. Morgan, the 41-year-old exec vp-marketing of New York-based Philip Morris USA since 1978, has been named chairman-chief executive officer of Atari. Beginning Sept. 6, he will direct a troika of seasoned electronics executives who were installed as division chiefs as part of a recent reorganization (AA, June 6).

Mr. Morgan's appointment is another case of East Coast marketing talent being lured to Silicon Valley. Apple Computer wooed John Sculley, Pepsi-Cola Co. president, to be its president-chief executive officer in May. Atari has been hiring East Coast marketing executives for key posts for some time, including Theodore Voss and Peter Wensberg, two top Polaroid marketing executives.

The electronics companies are turning to experienced mass-marketing talent as they find their traditional sales posture, touting product sophistication and technological sophistication, falling flat. Packaging and national advertising are now playing a crucial role.

Mr. Morgan succeeds Raymond Kassar, who resigned and will be a consultant. Mr. Kassar was praised in a statement by Warner chairman Steven Ross for his role in Atari's phenomenal growth.

However, Mr. Kassar's departure from the chairmanship has been expected, after Warner cut its earnings forecasts in half in December primarily because of sharp reversals at Atari. The Securities & Exchange Commission is known to be investigating Mr. Kassar's sale of a large block of Warner stock shortly before the December announcement.

'Hard-working' spots breaking for RC Cola

ROLLING MEADOWS, ILL.—Royal Crown Cola Co. is breaking a new campaign in 25 markets this week for its RC Cola. Two 30-second spots carry the theme, "Nothing really gets to you like RC Cola can." Each spot features five vignettes of hard-working people who after work refresh with an RC Cola. RC is positioning the cola away from the "idealized" people who appear in the Coke and Pepsi campaigns, the company told distributors. DFS, New York, handles.

AT&T may have to give up Bell trademark

WASHINGTON—AT&T got the grim news July 8 that approval of its mammoth divestiture plan hangs on, among other things, its willingness to give up the Bell name, trademark and logo. The company has invested millions of dollars this year in promoting newly formed American Bell. Federal Judge Harold Green is demanding surrender of the Bell name to the 22 local telephone companies to be spun off Jan. 1. Competitors in the equipment field contend AT&T's continued use of the trademark gives American Bell a competitive advantage. Judge Green specified that AT&T could use Bell during the first half of 1984, but only if it quickly selects a new name and has a "substantial" effort under way to promote it to the public

'News' works miracle on 42nd Street

"At this time last year, we had losses of $17 million. Now we are in the black and will be so when the year ends."
— Robert Hunt, publis[illegible] New York Daily News

By STUART EMMRICH

NEW YORK—A year and a half ago, Chicago's Tribune Co. looked at its New York Daily News and saw a newspaper on the skids. It lost $12.6 million in 1981, was projected to lose as much as $30 million in 1982 and was facing years of red ink.

Things looked so unpromising that, instead of agreeing to a $60 million revitalization plan proposed by Daily News management, the parent company decided to sell the paper. There followed the now well-documented five months of bumpy negotiations, shuttling from one potential buyer to another, uncertainty about the paper's future and then—surprisingly—the decision by Tribune Co. to keep the paper after all.

Now, nearly a year after that stunning switch and six months after News management was allowed to put its own rescue plan into operation, advertising is up, circulation is rising, costs have been slashed, and the Daily News is—believe it or not—making a profit.

No longer are people talking about the imminent death of the country's largest daily newspaper. There are those in this town who are calling it, instead, "the miracle on 42nd Street."

Executives at the paper, while less prone to hyperbole, are enthusiastic. "We are on target, with revenues exceeding our plan for 1983," says publisher Robert Hunt. "At this time last year, we had losses of $17 million. Now we are in the black and will be so when the year ends. That is a fine turnaround." Last year the paper had $314 million in revenues, a figure that analysts say could increase by 10% to 15% this year.

Mr. Hunt and other News execs won't disclose how large a profit they expect in 1983, but knowledgeable sources say it's possible that

If you can read this, you're into inversion

By JENNIFER PENDLETON

PASADENA, CAL.—There's a company in this town where the sight of employes hanging upside down from the ceiling is as common as workers punching a time clock.

The company is Gravity Guidance Inc., a sporting goods marketer whose main product is a pair of metal boots that enable their wearers to hang topsy-turvy from a bar.

Here, factory workers often spend their breaks putting the company's merchandise to use, as do most Gravity Guidance executives. While daily hanging isn't a prerequisite for employment, company president Bryce Martin admits, "I wouldn't hire someone who didn't believe in it." Says the company's marketing/communications coordinator Paula Johnson: "If you're hired, you hang."

The zeal with which Gravity Guidance employes believe in "inversion exercise" is apparently spilling over to the general population. Since the company began mass-marketing "gravity" or "inversion" boots in 1979, it has sold 400,000 pairs of these unusual ankle holders they're currently selling at a 25,000 pairs-a-month rate. Company sales have jumped from less than $125,000 in 1979 to an anticipated level of $30 million-plus this year.

The boots are selling at major sporting goods retailers, such as Oshman's, and mass retailers, such as Sears, Roebuck & Co., J.C. Penney Co. and Montgomery Ward & Co.

Still, Gravity Guidance is a small sporting goods marketer with big ambitions. At present, it is taking steps to build a position as a force in the sporting goods industry, concentrating on developing new inversion-exercise products (it markets other inversion-exercise

Exxon, Shell join testing of card-activated pumps

HOUSTON—Exxon Co. USA will begin an automatic bank teller access-card test program at 10 of its company-owned stations here this month, a move believed to be the first of its kind by a major gasoline company.

While a group of Shell Oil dealers in San Francisco six months ago began a bank debit-card test program with Wells Fargo Bank at approximately 25 Shell stations in the Bay Area, and a second group of Shell dealers in Cleveland began a similar test last month with AmeriTrust at 20 area stations, neither bank-card test is company-sponsored, according to a Shell Oil spokesperson.

However, Shell will begin a credit card-activated pump test this month at 10 of its Houston stations, the spokesperson said. And an industry source said the test will later be expanded to include both cash-activated and bank debit card machines.

At least three other gasoline marketers, Derby Refining, Mobil Oil and Texaco, are testing credit card-activated units (AA, Nov. 15), and Arco is testing ones that are cash-activated (AA, April 14).

The Exxon ATM terminals will honor First City Teller 2 and First City Net debit cards issued by First City National Bank of Houston.

To execute a transaction, an Exxon customer will insert a bank card into the terminal, punch in his personal identification number, the pump number, the grade of gas desired and then pump the gas. The dollar amount of the purchase will be electronically sent to the customer's bank, which will charge the customer's checking account. A printout receipt will be provided, and the transaction will be recorded on the customer's checking account.

Bank-card terminals will be located at Exxon's self-serve islands and inside the stations. The bank cards may be used as payment for all products and services available at Exxon stations.

Exxon considers bank-card transactions cash payments, and therefore will offer bank-card users the company's current program of "discount for cash," which provides cash-paying customers a discount of 4¢ per gallon at most stations.

Exxon will promote the test with direct mailings to cardholders living near test stations and with p.o.p.#

Red wine enters four test markets

Blue Nun flirts with rouge

By GAY JERVEY

NEW YORK—Having brought back the Stiller & Meara radio commercials for Blue Nun white wine, Schieffelin & Co. is now introducing Blue Nun red wine.

It also will be hawked by the comedy duo.

Made from French grapes but packaged in Alsey, West Germany, the red wine initially will be tested in North Carolina, Oregon, Tampa/St. Petersburg and Rochester/Buffalo, N.Y.

Sources say it represents one of the more critical new-product introductions in recent Schieffelin history—one that has been mulled for some time.

The new wine will come in two sizes: 750 ml and 1.5-liter bottles priced at $3.99 and $4.99, respectively. Through December, the test initially will involve some 20,000 cases; shipments reportedly could reach 200,000 cases in the test areas next year.

Schieffelin said that if all goes well the company will roll nationally by the end of next year. "We want about a year to watch it," said Schieffelin senior vp Frank Dandrea.

Although Mr. Dandrea would not comment on the new red's ad budget, some wine and spirits distributors have been told the company will be spending at an annual national rate of $6 million, mostly involving spot radio and p.o.p. displays. "They're not going to use tv, at least not now," said one Orlando, Fla., distributor, "and I think it's a mistake."

Schieffelin reportedly is spending $4 million in radio in 1983 for both Blue Nun white and red. Jerry Stiller and Anne Meara, the comedy team who made Blue Nun a household name as the easy-to-pronounce—therefore approachable—white wine, will be heard in red, white and generic "Blue" ads.

With the theme, "Just as right as Blue Nun white," radio spots for the new product stress that whether served chilled or at room temperature, "It's always correct."

Most distributors seem excited about the product's potential among regular Blue Nun imbibers

Miller ad results in 'CR' suit

NEW YORK—Consumers Union, publisher of Consumer Reports, is proceeding with a lawsuit against Miller Brewing Co., charging the Milwaukee-based brewer with false and misleading advertising.

At issue is an ad highlighting the results of an article on beer appearing in the magazine (AA, July 4).

The two sides met last Thursday to exchange "views," but nothing was said during the meeting to merit stopping the court action, according to representatives of both sides.

Consumers Union had filed suit a few days earlier in New York federal court, asking for compensatory damages of $1 million, punitive damages of at least $1 million and court costs.

The publisher's objections stem from Miller's printing of a Miller High Life ad that referred to the July issue of Consumer Reports that contained a cover story on beers. One feature listed Miller High Life at the top of a list of "very good" tasting beers.

The article ranked various brands of beer in order of what was called their "estimated overall sensory quality." They were ranked in three groups: Very good,

Special Report

Radio

New tools, new tunes

By J. Fred MacDonald

Radio is experiencing one of the most innovative and competitive periods in its history. No longer a staid business of local broadcasters programing for changeless listeners, American radio today is reassessing old formats, pinpointing new audiences and broadening its perspectives. Not since the 1950s, when tv supplanted it as the principal medium of mass entertainment, has radio been in such a scramble. Only this time it is radio that is on the upswing.

J. Fred MacDonald, a frequent contributor to Magazine, is a professor of American cultural history at Northeastern Illinois University, Chicago. He is the author of a book on radio history entitled "Don't Touch That Dial!"

The sources of this activity are several. New technology is revolutionizing the meaning of radio. Deregulation is catalyzing competition. A perceptible revival of the national economy is increasing the financial stakes. And shifting demographic patterns are challenging programers and advertisers.

"These are terribly more competitive times," says Jhan Hiber,

New tools

president of Hiber, Hart and Patrick, a Pebble Beach, Cal.-based radio research company. "About half the radio stations in the country are not making money, and few will make money unless they come up with new ideas and get back to the basics of what radio is all about—being a good station and serving the public."

A key element is modern technology, which is being integrated into radio. There are already about 200 am stations broadcasting in stereo, and commercial sets capable of receiving am stereo are expected soon. By the end of the year 10% to 12% of the population will own some form of walkabout radio.

Arbitron has plans to use computer terminals in subscriber stations soon to disseminate ratings reports and rolling monthly averages. And one industry seer anticipates that automobiles will soon be equipped with radios capable of receiving more than one signal simultaneously. With jacks and headsets, each passenger can listen to his or her own station.

Computer technology is also a part of news reportage. At stations like KNEW (am) in Oakland, Cal., and WOR (am) in New York, news personnel are carrying computer terminals when they rush off to cover fast-breaking stories.

Satellite distribution is rapidly making radio once again a major medium of nationally known personalities. Larry King on Mutual has become a national phenomenon.

"We feed wire service stories, our own news copy, even our commercials into our computer," says Ted Feurey, assistant news director at WOR, "and reporters in the field gain two-way access to this data by tying their terminals to our computer via the telephone." Further, Mr. Feurey adds, "In five years all networks and news stations will have this system or one like it."

Outer space technology is also affecting radio, as communications satellites redefine the function of radio as a medium of narrowcasting. By the end of the year all major radio networks will have abandoned landlines and will rely totally upon satellite transmission."The satellite gives us as many as 19 channels with which to service our affiliates, says ABC Radio Networks president Edward F. McLaughlin. "This means that without preempting regular network news and features, we can feed our stations complete sports contests, political speeches with only local appeal, and underutilized programing such as classical music, drama and children's shows."

Westwood One, with offices in Los Angeles and New York, claims to be the nation's largest producer-distributor of syndicated radio shows. It is one of the few major independents not recently purchased by network radio, and at Westwood, satellites mean big business. "We are transmitting simulcasts of HBO musical specials, we air live rock concerts and we have 28 different regular features, such as a weekly one-hour country-music concert, 'Live from Gilley's,'" says Norm Pattiz, Westwood One's president.

While Mr. Pattiz sees the continuance of tapes and discs as means of program distribution, he notes that "satellites will take a larger share and increase flexibility considerably." But, he continues, "competition among major suppliers of programing will be intense."

Satellite distribution is rapidly making radio once again a major medium of nationally known personalities. Larry King on the Mutual network has become a national phenomenon with his provocative early-morning talk show. Bob Law is the host of a black-oriented overnight talk show that originates at WWRL (am) in New York, but is heard throughout the East, Midwest and South. Certainly, there have always been network newsmen, such at ABC's Paul Harvey, now heard on 1,075 stations and host of four of the top nine shows in network radio. But there are also new personalities in unfamiliar formats, including Dr. Demento, whose banter and novelty recordings are syndicated by Westwood One, and Susan Forward and Toni Grant, psychologists whose talk shows on ABC treat psychology-related issues.

In the scramble for listeners, many stations are disregarding old barriers of race and language. "We see greater numbers of stations expanding to include black audiences."

Coupled with new technology, governmental deregulation is also affecting contemporary radio. Under the Reagan administration, the Federal Communications Commission has lifted requirements regarding news and public service announcements, dropped log requirements and lifted limitations on commercial minutes. Further, licensing regulations for operators have been discarded, and licensing periods are now seven years instead of three. In May, the FCC voted to add new stations to the fm spectrum, a ruling that is expected to result in the creation of 600 to 800 new outlets.

Deregulation is getting mixed reviews. Speaking specifically about the allocation of hundreds of new fm licenses, Kalamazoo, Mich.-based James H. Duncan Jr., editor and publisher of "American Radio," believes it will have a "disastrous" effect. "This will only shrink radio's pie and mean the loss of revenue for all stations," he says. This is at a time, he continues, when "radio is already the most competitive medium."

For Miles David, vice-chairman and chief executive officer of the Radio Advertising Bureau in New York, deregulation is allowing station operators to be less concerned with rules that were often obsolete and burdensome. As for the new stations, Mr. David believes that "in a world of 8,000 to 9,000 existing radio outlets, a few hundred new stations will not have a tremendous impact."

But at ABC, president Mr. McLaughlin welcomes the additions, noting "we have services to sell, and more stations mean more potential sales." He adds, "for stations extend broadcasting hours, that helps, too."

This period of flux has extended throughout the radio business. At National Public Radio, for example, multi-million-dollar budget shortfalls have resulted in massive firings and program cutbacks and rumors of bankruptcy. NPR is left practically with only its two news-features programs, "Morning Edition" and "All Things Considered." Yet "A Prairie Home Companion," produced by Minnesota Public Radio and syndicated to most NPR stations, is an overwhelming success.

Watching vs. listening

Light tv viewers listen more . . .

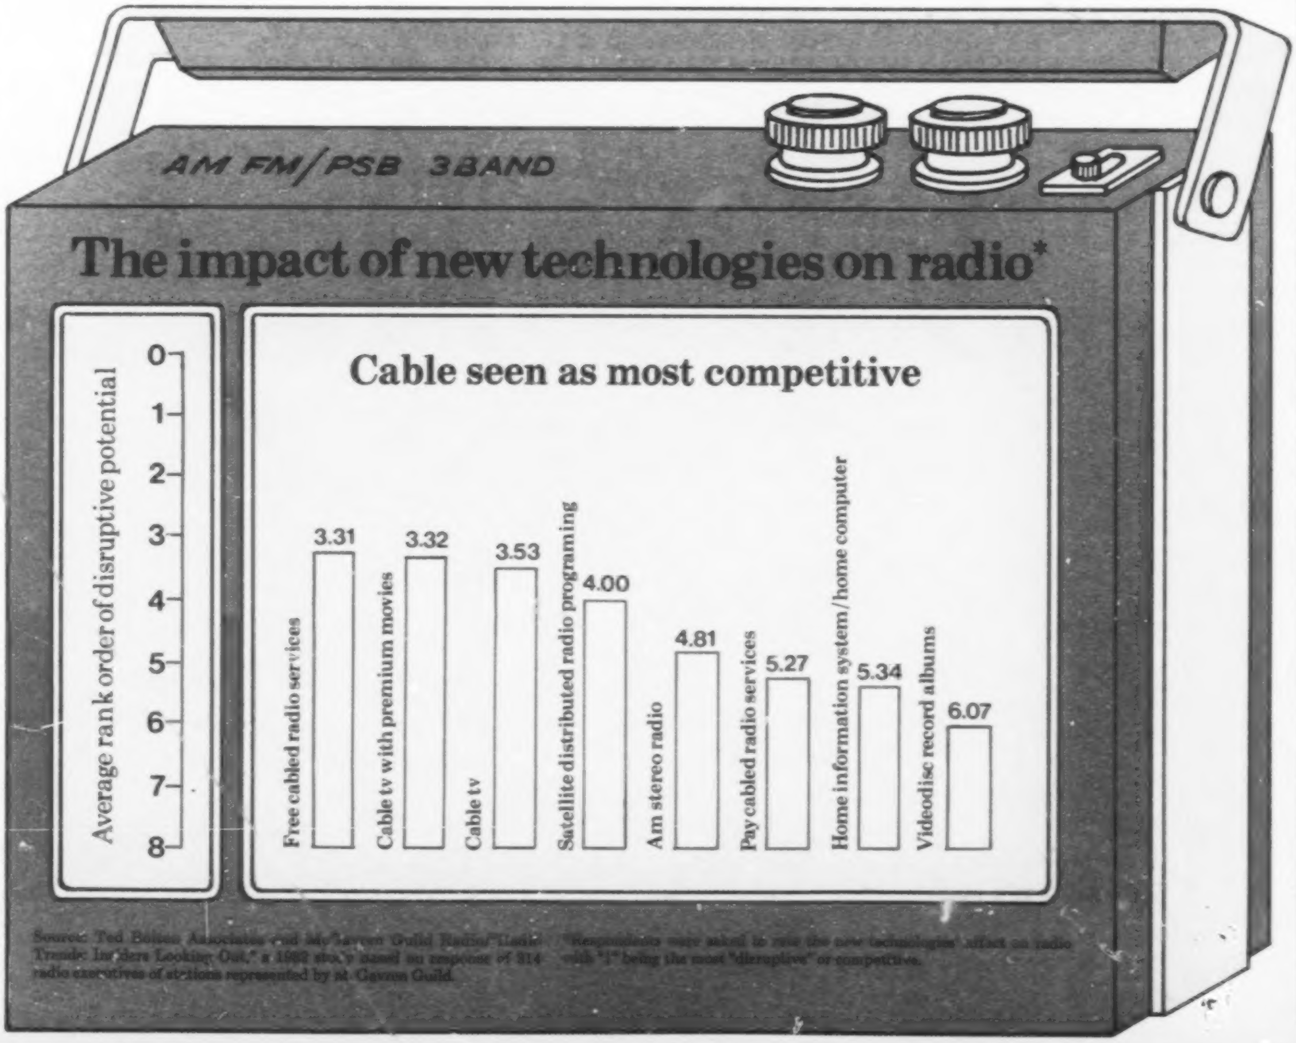
Although tv gets 45% of adult media time, and radio 39%, it is the radio listeners that advertisers should go after, says the RAB. Why? They make more money.



The impact of new technologies on radio*

Cable seen as most competitive

Source: Ted Bolton Associates and McGavren Guild Radio/"Radio Trends: Insiders Looking Out," a 1982 study based on response of 314 radio executives of stations represented by McGavren Guild.

*Respondents were asked to rate the new technologies' affect on radio with "1" being the most "disruptive" or competitive.

Some local stations are also developing innovative responses. WJOK in Gaithersburg, Md., is the country's only all-comedy station. And co-owner Bob Cobbins is so pleased with listener and advertiser reaction, he has plans to syndicate the format. In Salt Lake City, KLAF mixes comedy recordings with oldtime radio shows and in less than two months has increased advertising revenue by 500%.

Traditional formats are being reevaluated. "As a result of the urban cowboy craze, our country-music audience grew greatly," says Mike Oatman, co-owner and chief executive officer of Great Empire Broadcasting, Wichita, Kan., which has nine country stations in the South and Midwest. "But to keep the younger converts to country music, we added a good deal of the more traditional sound to our play mix, since young people prefer the older, less acoustical music."

"Formats are being splintered," says Pam Hamilton, vp-director of creative service for RKO Radio Networks. "There is so much crossover entertainment that the older designations are becoming passe, and programers are culling from all formats to create hybrids suited to specific markets."

This point is underscored by Mr. Hiber of Hiber, Hart and Patrick. He says that the new urban contemporary format is having great success playing music meant to appeal to listeners of all ethnic backgrounds. "In New York we worked with WRKS-FM to attract black, white and Hispanic listeners," he notes, "and in Detroit, with a small Hispanic population, the appeal was narrowed to blacks and whites."

In the scramble for listeners, many stations are disregarding old barriers of race and language. "We see greater numbers of stations expanding to include black audiences," says Bill Baldwin, vp at the New York-based Black Radio Network. Conversely, many black-oriented stations, particularly with urban contemporary formats, are luring nonblack listeners.

Also of growing interest to broadcasters and advertisers are Hispanics, a population group expected to be the nation's largest ethnic minority by the end of the century.

According to Eduardo Caballero at Caballero Spanish Media, New York, the Hispanic market is lucrative, geographically concentrated, yet underrepresented on radio.

Still, he predicts, "within three years there will be a substantial rise in the number of Spanish-language stations, particularly on am."

If radio is turning back to overlooked audiences, it is also revitalizing some of its older appeal. Personality is being reemphasized. "The wall-to-wall music era is past," notes Mr. Oatman of Great Empire Broadcasting, "because listeners want companionship, not just music. This means disk jockeys who talk to the audience and cultivate on-air mystiques."

The power of radio in communicating personality is also understood by today's politicians. Not since the days of Franklin D. Roosevelt and his "fireside chats" while he was president exploited radio as much as Ronald Reagan.

State and local politicians also are appearing on their own talk shows, an example being Illinois' James Thompson, whose "Ask the Governor" is aired regularly on WBBM (am) in Chicago.

Black politicians have also turned to radio. The election of Chicago's new mayor, Harold Washington, was accomplished in great part through radio advertising and voter registration drives conducted by the city's black-oriented stations. In Philadelphia, the primary victory of Wilson Goode was credited in part to nonpartisan voter registration drives and community-awareness programing by that city's black-oriented stations, WHAT (am) and particularly WDAS (am) and WDAS(fm).

> "I'm bullish on radio. . . . After suffering for the past two years, the industry experienced a very strong quarter this year, and the rest of 1983 will finish strongly."

On a broader scale, moreover, the Rev. Jesse Jackson and his Operation PUSH are using radio in their "Southern Crusade" to register 2 million new black voters in 10 southern states.

All of these developments are occurring during a time of generalized economic optimism. "I'm bullish on radio," says Mr. Duncan of "American Radio." "After suffering for two years," he says, "the industry experienced a very strong second quarter this year, and the rest of 1983 will finish strongly."

At ABC Radio Networks, Mr. McLaughlin reports a growth rate more than 20% ahead of figures for last year. "As a result," he notes, "many advertising agencies in New York and Chicago are asking for presentations on network radio as an alternative to higher-price tv and less penetrating newspapers and magazines."

Miles David of RAB summarizes this upbeat appraisal when he suggests that "only radio can target audiences and deliver frequency at a reasonable cost." And, he continues, "once advertisers realize that radio has not been hurt by cable tv, that it is the favorite medium of 65% of that sizable portion of Americans who are light tv viewers, and that the consumer with upscale education and income is most readily reached by radio, advertisers will turn to the medium as never before."

Rock fm: Branching out

By Mark Liff

Be it with "Solid Gold" oldies, album-oriented rock (AOR), adult contemporary, soft rock, urban contemporary, country-rock or even the new and growing top 40 fm, rock radio stations are trying to establish their own audiences and hold on to them in an ever-changing market. In the past decade, fm has increased its market share dramatically—and its share of the precious advertising dollar.

Why the different formats? "If everybody wore the same clothes, what would make someone stand out?" asks Jane Sobel, research manager, computer services, at New York-based McGavren Guild Radio.

And standing out means success.

Ms. Sobel studied am/fm formats and their strengths in 30 markets, using Arbitron shares over four sweep periods: Spring and fall, 1981 and 1982. "The major formats on the fm band are AOR, adult contemporary, beautiful music, urban contemporary and country," says the study, "AM/FM National/Regional Format Trends." Rock, in various formats, clearly dominates.

Soft rock and middle-of-the-road (MOR) formats have dropped off, the survey says. Ms. Sobel's survey shows a 110.0 share point increase for fm from spring, 1981, to fall, 1982, compared with an 80.1 share point drop for am.

"This is a dynamic and fluid medium, so competitive," says James Duncan Jr., the Kalamazoo, Mich.-based editor and publisher of "American Radio," a twice-a-year industry survey. "New York, for example, has 65 or 70 stations scrambling for a piece of the pie. The No. 1 station last fall, WBLS (fm), had only 5.6% of the listeners."

And when one station falters, there are five or six others "ready, willing and able to swoop in and take over," he adds. "Stations are looking constantly for a vacuum they can fill—for positions, advertising-wise. Advertising is the bottom line."

"Fm contemporary radio has been dominating am for years now," says Jeff Pollack, a radio consultant in Pacific Palisades, Cal. Rarely do am stations dominate markets if they play contemporary music, he says, adding that "99% of markets are dominated by fm rock."

Adds Gary Stevens, president of Doubleday Broadcasting Co., which has nine fm stations across the country: "Fm in general is big—62% of all listening is on fm. And, for the first time, a majority of billing is fm."

And in the 18-to-34 age bracket, which is the prime audience for rock music, the listener share is closer to 80%, Mr. Stevens points out.

The switch to fm started in the late 1960s. Fm began playing songs heard on am—but in stereo, with clearer sound. "People discovered fm and the improved quality of signal and it just exploded from there," says Mr. Pollack, the California consultant.

Fm rock had its roots in "underground" or "progressive" fm stations that generally played album cuts. The screaming top 40 am deejay was replaced by a more "laid back" fm personality—often a "graduate" of college radio—who almost whispered into the microphone, nonetheless playing hard rock.

"Progressive stations attracted a younger audience to fm, which, until then, was dominated by beautiful music, classical or simulcasts," says Mr. Duncan.

"Eventually, old-line progressive stations attracted big audiences, but had a hard time selling their product."

And when they did make advertising sales, "they had a hard time collecting" from here-today-gone-tomorrow "head shops" and other similar stores, he adds. "They had a terrible time attracting mainstream advertisers to that format."

Among the pioneers were WNEW (fm) and WOR (fm) in New York, industry observers say. From this grew album-oriented rock, under the tutelage of prominent consultants. Their concept? "Play the cream of albums, the superstar concept," says Mr. Duncan. "It was extremely successful between 1974 and 1981."

These stations were able to attract "blue chip advertisers" because their demographic audience was so diverse: The average AOR audience is as follows, according to Mr. Duncan. Teen agers make up some one-fourth

The Superjock carries on

By Ed Zotti

It's 9:45 on a weekday morning in Chicago, and WLS (am) radio deejay Larry (Uncle Lar) Lujack and sidekick "Li'l Snot-Nose Tommy" Edwards have just launched into their daily feature, the widely acclaimed, world-renowned (they claim) "Animal Stories."

"I think you're going to be excited about this gift we got in the mail, Li'l Tommy," says Uncle Lar in his sardonic baritone voice. "Guy writes, 'dear Uncle Lar and Li'l Tommy, having been inspired by your recent animal product story concerning that poor guy at the disco, I have purchased for you your very own official animal stories disco kit.'" "Oh, good," chirps Li'l Tommy.

"See, what he sent us here, Li'l Tommy, is this big hefty hickory smoked sausage [laughter]. Now, I'm going to show you how this official disco kit works. First I'm going to hypnotize you, so close your eyes, and you're slowly sinking into a deep sleep. You there yet [giggles]? Okay, now imagine you're no longer Li'l Tommy but instead you're some cheap bleached-blonde floozy in a disco.

"Now don't open your eyes until I tell you. I'm going to install the disco kit here [sounds of exertion intermixed with giggles] so you can get an idea how this works. Now, imagine you're this cheap blonde floozy in the disco, and I'm standing there next to John Travolta, okay, and you walk in and see us there. Admittedly John Travolta is better looking than I am, but now that I have my disco kit installed [sound of someone standing up], I want you to check this out . . ."

"Can I look now?" Li'l Tommy pipes up.

"Yeah, and tell us which one you'd go for." [Eruption of hysterical laughter, general commotion. Continues for 20 seconds.]

"I mean, you're going to be hitting on me all night, right?" [Insane cackling from Li'l Tommy. Renewed pounding on table, more laughter.] "I mean . . . this commands respect, doesn't it? Thank you, folks, for one of the most useful gifts we've ever received."

Thus concludes another off-the-wall edition of a comedy bit that has helped to make Larry Lujack something of a legend, both in Chicago and in the radio business generally. At a crusty 43, he's the most listened-to morning personality in the city among the all-important 18-to-44-year-old audience. (But in terms of over-all audience 12 years old and above, Wally Phillips of WGN (am) takes it away with an approximate 15.5% share, compared with Larry Lujack's 8.4%.)

More to the point, Superjock, as he is referred to by the station, has been at the top of the heap in Chicago more or less continuously since 1967. That's quite an achievement in rock 'n' roll radio, where personalities come and go like the phases of the moon.

Mary Herlehy

"You're only young once," says Larry Lujack, "but you can be immature forever."

"I've been listening to him since I was a kid," says Terri Hemmert, morning deejay at WXRT, Chicago, an fm progressive rock station. "I have nothing but respect for the guy. Comedians might go on tour or something, but they don't have to go on the air five or six days a week, 50 weeks a year, and day after day come up with new material. It's incredible. I hope I last as long as Larry."

Whatever his secret, Uncle Lar has helped keep WLS a contender in the competitive Chicago radio market.

The 50,000-watt station remains the American Broadcasting Co.'s only major-market am outlet that hasn't shifted from rock to news-talk in the wake of the fm onslaught. Popular personalities like Mr. Lujack are a large part of the explanation.

"We all get the same records," general manager John Gehron says, "so how do you make yourself sound different? If your format is based on music, you're only as good as the record that's playing. If it's a record that listeners don't like, they'll go to another station. But if they're listening to their favorite personality, they're going to stay because they're afraid they'll miss something."

Besides "Animal Stories," Mr. Lujack's listeners look forward to the "Cheap Trashy Show Biz Report," which is pretty much what it sounds like, complete with Walter Winchell-type telegraph key. Occasionally they'll also hear "Police Beat," a segment that deals with "drunks and sex perverts and all that kind of stuff," Uncle Lar says.

It all sounds totally spontaneous and casual, but in fact a lot of preparation goes into it. Mr. Lujack regularly puts in 12-to-14-hour days. Each segment of "Animal Stories" alone takes two to three hours of work.

"I may sound like I'm winging it on the air, but I'm not," Mr. Lujack confesses. "With some guys you can just turn on a microphone, set them down in front of it and they'll come up with something. Some days I can do that, but most days I can't. That's why I spend so much time here—to last in this business, I have to."

Having spent 25 years pounding out the hits, Mr. Lujack concedes he's a little burnt out. "I can still honestly say I love the music, but any disk jockey who tells you he enjoys listening to the same records time after time after time is lying," he says. "It's to the point now where once I leave this radio station I don't want to hear any music."

Admittedly, the six-figure salary Mr. Lujack pulls down—he's said to be the second-best-paid radio personality in Chicago, next to WGN's ageless Wally Phillips—goes a long way toward assuaging his pain.

In the meantime, he offers a few words to live by for his legions of faithful admirers: "You're only young once," he solemnly intones, "but you can stay immature forever."

Back in the Earle-y days of pioneers

By Morrie Gelman

In 1927, little more than six years after the historic first broadcasts of WWJ in Detroit and KDKA in Pittsburgh, there were more than 700 radio stations licensed in the U.S. Listeners were addicts, sitting up into the late hours of the night, ears glued to head sets, twisting dials, searching for reception.

There was a fascination with receiving distant stations—"DX hunting," it was called, and it soon became a favorite indoor activity. Proud was the radio enthusiast, who, after many anxious moments of groping with the dial, could pull into a midwestern home, say, KFI (am) from Los Angeles.

KFI probably was heard around the country more than any other station in the early days of radio. And KFI meant Earle C. Anthony.

Although radio personalities continue to have a powerful impact on a station's appeal, E.C. Anthony was something else again. He was a pioneer in radio, but to say just that is to credit E.C.—as his associates referred to him—with only the white bread of what he was. Also, he was a smorgasbord of things, a proud, independent, honest, complicated, eccentric man.

When he died 23 years ago at the age of 80, he still owned KFI, a station he founded in 1922. Now the station is owned by Cox Communications and plays contemporary music. E.C. wouldn't have approved. His favorite was John Charles Thomas, a light opera singer who will not go down in fame in the company of Caruso and Pavarotti. When there was a tough business meeting at KFI, when the tension got too thick, E.C. would put on a John Charles Thomas record and play it on the phonograph he had in his office. He also had an upright piano there on which he liked to play "Maple Leaf Rag," and he had an organ in the "castle," as his house near Griffith Park was called.

Morrie Gelman is senior reporter and West Coast bureau chief with ADVERTISING AGE in Los Angeles.

It didn't matter who was in his office with him. He knew presidents, business leaders, celebrities of all kinds. It was E.C.'s way of making the other guy nervous, having to sit there and listen to a long record.

Gladser Studio

Earle C. Anthony was known as a tough cookie.

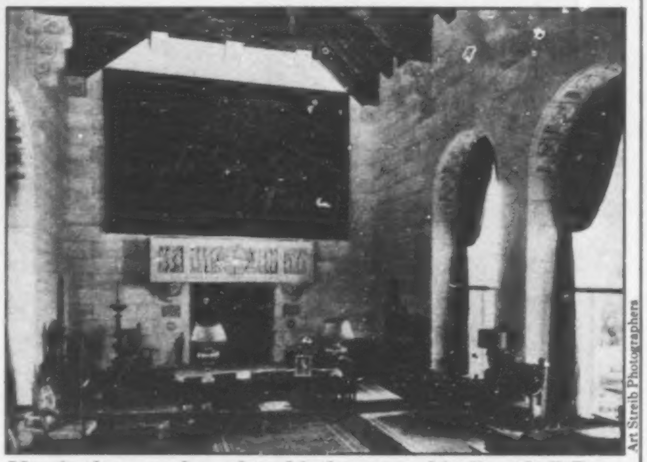
He was stern, even inflexible, when it came to what he believed was good taste in programing. He wouldn't allow anything on the air that had a breath of being off color. Indeed, he was so far right in politics that perhaps the John Birch Society would have been to the left of him. For example, Mr. Anthony had to be persuaded to carry President Roosevelt's fireside chats. And during the presidential campaign of Dwight Eisenhower in 1952, he once demanded his news people read a Saturday Evening Post editorial in favor of the general's candidacy along with the 5:30 news. His station manager, Charles Hamilton, restrained him.

"You're just chicken, Charlie, you're just chicken," said E.C., who loved a fight.

There's a wealth of stories about Earle C. Anthony. He was one of a kind, a self-made millionaire many times over, an innovator, as different from most of today's bottom-line oriented station owners as King Tut is to Milton Friedman.

Even tv copied him. "Good Morning, World," a short-lived CBS situation comedy that lasted from 1967 to 1968 was about a Los Angeles radio station owned by the overbearing Roland B. Hutton Jr., played by Billy De Wolfe. The resemblance to E.C. Anthony was more than coincidental.

KFI, one of the great radio stations in the country, was treated as a pet, almost a hobby, by Mr. Anthony, but it happened to be a great moneymaker. It was one of the original 24 clear channel radio stations in the nation (a clear channel is a channel on which only one station in the country operates at nighttime). It was long affiliated with NBC, transmitting with 50kw of power (no station in the U.S. was allowed more power) in the most favorable 640 kilocycles position on the dial.



Art Streib Photographers

Mr. Anthony referred to his home as his "castle." From this view of his living room, you can understand why.

In one anecdote about Mr. Anthony, he had his chauffeur drive to an Indian reservation outside of Palm Springs. Mr. Anthony then tuned to a rival station on the car radio and had his chauffeur walk out into the desert until the sound of the station was no longer audible. Then the dial would be switched to KFI. Being more powerful, the chauffeur had to walk a lot further out into the desert before the signal disappeared. Mr. Anthony took this experiment back to his office and ordered his sales staff to try it on clients.

Mr. Anthony actually had cars on his mind when he started KFI, wanting a means to promote his automobile dealerships. It was as an auto pioneer that he made his money. His story starts in the Midwest.

Earle C. Anthony was born in Washington, Ill., in 1880. His family moved to Los Angeles in 1892. At 17, in the spring of 1897 (the same year the Stanley twins, F.O. and F.E., built their first steam car) as a student at Los Angeles High School, he conceived and constructed what is believed to be the first self-propelled vehicle in California. After earning a degree in electrical engineering at the University of California at Berkeley, Mr. Anthony, in 1904, in association with his father, opened and operated what was then the West's "greatest" motor car emporium, handling such fine cars of the era as the Thomas Flyer, Northern, Knox, National Electric, Pope-Toledo, Stevens-Duryea, and Packard.

He organized the El Dorado Motor State Line, which later became the Pickwick and then the Greyhound System. He built and operated the first gasoline service station in the state, expanded it into a chain under the name National Supply Stations, and these became the present Chevron Standard Stations.

It was also Earle C. Anthony who brought the first neon signs to the U.S. from France. He mobilized the automobile dealers in the state to get the Bay Bridge built, spanning San Francisco Bay. Breaking with all precedent, he stepped from local to national advertising to sell the services of his automobile dealership, taking a full page ad in the Saturday Evening Post, inviting Mr. and Mrs. American Motorist to bring their cars to California for the finest service to be found anywhere.

He was the principal Packard Motor Car Co. dealer in the West, and it broke his heart when that automobile manufacturer went out of business. He was a heavy drinker most of his adult life, and in the later years it began to show.

They played his favorite songs on the day of his funeral when he was buried in Forest Lawn in Glendale, Cal.

His survivors were his son, Kelly, who died soon after, and some distant nephews and nieces. Most of his estate was left to the University of California and to California Institute of Technology.

What Earle C. Anthony said better than anything else was the KFI frost warnings.

It's 8 p.m., primetime on network radio, a time when affiliates just don't mess around with the program schedule. Mr. Anthony said nuts to that and to NBC. "We're going to give the fruit growers in the state a three-minute frost warning every night," he said.

He did, too, with the station then fading in to whatever network program already was in progress.

Independence? Integrity to public service? Eccentricity? He was all these things, and more.

of the audience; 18-to-34-year-olds, about 70%, and 18-to-49-year-olds, about 74%. (There is no am/fm breakdown.)

Adds Mr. Pollack: "In the old days, a station like WABC-AM [in New York] could have everybody. But with a switching audience and the intense competition, what resulted was fragmentation. A radio station goes after a specific demographic."

(WABC now is the flagship of ABC's "TalkRadio" network.)

"Fm fragmentation has been coming slowly for the last eight or nine years," says John Bowen, president of John Blair Radio.

As a result, Mr. Bowen says, radio stations "will have to do a better job selling than they used to." The bottom line? "If a station doesn't program well, it doesn't win," he says. "Advertisers will look for a station that reaches audiences."

To "win," stations have turned to the different formats. Each gives advertisers an example to better target their market. For advertisers, this can have big pluses: Airlines, for example, can advertise on radio stations that have listeners who travel.

And advertising representatives have become wise enough to know that some formats are nothing more than broad labels. "Adult contemporary—what does it mean?" asks Ellen Hullebert, executive vp-marketing and communications with McGavren Guild. "It is a wide range, a safe format so people are not excluded from advertising. You can come up with a million names for different stations."

And formats change constantly. In Dallas, for example, KIXK (fm), owned by Hicks Communications, changed from country to "Classic Hits," a concept devised by Rob Balon and Lee Bayley, the self-proclaimed "Killer Bs" of programing and research. In a National Radio Broadcasters Assn. bulletin, Mr. Balon is quoted as saying he "tried to reach the disgruntled AOR listener."

"Classic Hits" include the bigger oldies of the past few decades. Ratings for the 18-to-34 group (men only) immediately jumped from 1.1 to 6.3 from 6 a.m. to 12 p.m. and from 1.0 to 8.9 from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. for the same group, according to the NRBA.

Last year, New York-based Doubleday purchased WTFM (fm), an easy-listening station in Lake Success, N.Y., and turned it into WAPP (fm), a highly successful rock station.

Another good example of what a few changes can do is KROQ (fm) in Los Angeles. In September, 1978, KROQ had no ratings. At that time, the station purchased the services of consultant Rick Carroll. Since then, KROQ has catapulted into the top of the rock radio ratings heap. What is the secret? According to general manager Pat Welsh, the key is combining the "cream of the crop of today's new progressive music with a sprinkle of classic oldies from the 1960s and early 1970s." Strong and identifiable air personalities help, as well. It's hard to forget such names as Ramondo & the Blade, Freddy Snakeskin and Jed The Fish and Sam Freeze and his Freeze Dizeez.

In Orlando, Fla., WHLY (fm) has gone to adult rock from 7 p.m. to midnight, playing AOR, including the Doobie Brothers and Jethro Tull.

"We realize that although the Woodstock generation has grown up, they have not outgrown their musical tastes," Mark Kaplowe, the program director, told the NRBA.

And, for example, CBS radio now stresses a "HitRadio" format. According to a CBS bulletin: "The 'HitRadio' format focuses on a tight play list with all the currents being played in high rotation, along with the bigger hits of the recent past. Anytime you tune in, you're likely to hear your favorite hit in fairly short order."

And fm formats will continue to change and evolve from AOR to "Hot Hits!" to "Solid Gold" to others as stations continue to jockey for audience share—and advertising dollars.

Got a sick station? Dial a radio guru

By Mitchell J. Shields

In those earlier days of radio the heroes were men like Alan Freed, Cousin Brucie and Murray the K, deejays with a slightly mad disposition and a tendency to follow their noses—or ears, if you're being practical about the thing—into uncharted realms of music. They would pick and choose from the records available to them and set the patterns others would try to emulate. They were the ones who gave the spark to the sound that jumped out of tinny car speakers and squat machines by the bed. They were the arbiters of audio cool, and the appreciative listening audience knew it.

Today, though, the real creative work isn't being done in the studio but in offices removed from the hurly-burly of broadcast, offices like the album-crammed warren of Lee Abrams.

Mr. Abrams is probably one of the most powerful men in radio. With his partner, Kent Burkhart, he developed a programing format that in the 1970s all but defined successful radio. And he did it not as an employe of any one radio station but as an outside observer, a consultant brought in like a hired gun to mow down the opposition.

The Atlanta-based consulting company of Burkhart/Abrams/-Michaels/Douglas & Associates is generally considered to be the top radio programing consulting group in the nation. It has grown from nothing to a major force in slightly more than a decade. Not coincidentally that same period has seen radio change from an industry in which outside opinions were almost never sought into one where having the right consultant can mean the difference between lackluster performance and blazing success.

"Radio is kind of behind other business in using consultants," notes John Sebastian, a consultant in Phoenix, Ariz, with a string of radio clients. "Tire companies, banks, airlines, cereal makers, they've all used consultants for years to get outside perspectives. It just took radio a little while to learn the truth that two heads are better than one."

Though radio uses management consultants and sales consultants who operate pretty much as they do in any other industry, when the term is bandied about in the broadcast booth it means only one thing—a programing consultant. The way a programing consultant shapes sound varies, depending on how much aid a station seeks. The range of services offered runs from a quick analysis of problems, for which a top consultant might charge $5,000, to a complete restructuring that goes all the way from what music is played, and in what order, to the frequency with which the songs are interrupted by the station's call letters and the slang used by the deejays.

One of the most obvious items the programing consultants sell is expertise. "There just aren't that many great programers in the country, the real turnaround programers," says Kent Burkhart, partner with the 10-year-old Burkhart/Abrams. "There are maybe 19 really good ones, and some 9,000 radio stations."

And growing in importance are the research systems a consultant has to offer. Clients are more likely to ask for demographic proof that a change will work, and consultants have to be able to give it to them.

"You have to recognize that the need of the industry changes," says George A. Burns, president of Burns Media Consultants in Studio City, Cal. "Those of us who have hung around for some time have adapted our services to the times. It's not just a guy who knows how to pick records anymore. In the last few years the research area has been very important, and you've had to learn how to deal with focus groups or the computer generated play lists. High tech is coming to our business like everything else."

For the services of a consultant, a station can be charged from $1,000 to $6,000 a month, depending on its size. "Consulting is expensive," Mr. Burkhart says. "But on the other hand . . . we walked into a radio station in New York that had lost $2 million a year for 10 years. We changed the station, changed its call letters, put a whole new front on it, and the station jumped into the upper echelon. The station went to a $2 million operating profit. Was that worth $5,000 a month? The answer has to be yes."

Despite the lucrative nature of the business, there is not, most consultants agree, much head-to-head competition among those trying to sell radio stations on different formats. The reason is that at the moment the demand far exceeds the number of people around to meet it. There are 9,000 radio stations in the country, and a company like Burkhart/Abrams is likely to be servicing only a few hundred.

"In the beginning we had to go out and knock on some doors," Lee Abrams says, "but now we don't do that. We let the busi-

CHICAGO BUSINESS CAPTURED!

Who provides advertisers with Chicago's most captive business audience? New research leaves no question.

It's not a national business publication. It's not a local magazine. It's not a daily newspaper.

It's Crain's Chicago Business. Pure and simple.

Why? Because the people reading Crain's are the people you want reading your message. And the only people you should have to pay for. Upper and middle management.

So while the daily newspapers, for instance, provide you an audience including everyone from steel workers to school teachers, Crain's provides you the most efficient way to reach Chicago's business leaders.

As a matter of fact, more than half of Crain's subscribers don't read the daily Chicago Tribune regularly; and 72.3% aren't regular readers of the daily Sun-Times.*

For a complete media kit that includes this enlightening new research information, just call 1-312-649-5370 and ask for Gloria Scoby, Advertising Director.

On-air docs prove therapeutic for ratings

By John Revett

Put the health and fitness trend together with a weak economy, and they spell more "doctor" and medical-related advice and self-help programing. Now you can have answers to questions on everything from love and sex problems to optometry, arthritis, nutrition, alcoholism and drugs—all on the radio.

As an official at the Radio-TV News Directors Assn. in Washington says: "We know there are more [of these programs] now than there used to be, but we have no system for keeping track of them. We know that most of the all-news stations have health or medical segments of one kind or another."

Alan Blum, now editor of the New York state "Journal of Medicine," had his own medical call-in program on WNWS (am) in Miami for two years, until late 1979. And he had mixed feelings about the increase in the call-in programs. "What bothered me was it showed a failure of patient trust in their doctors," Dr. Blum says. "They're fearful and looking for assurance. My role was to discuss the problems in general and encourage them to see a doctor."

Other concerns revolve around the sponsorship of such shows by pharmaceutical companies and health and beauty aids advertisers. The American Psychological Assn. has been grappling with complaints about these and other aspects of on-air psychologists in considering guideline revisions, but thus far, no such guidelines have been implemented. Neither has the American Medical Assn. taken any strong positions one way or another on how on-air doctor programs should be conducted. The reaction, in general, however, seems positive.

Sonya Friedman has helped put WXYZ among the top three Detroit stations.

W. J. Lewis, an AMA trustee, said in a speech in Boston some months ago that it's "highly desirable to let the public hear good, sound medical advice." Dr. Lewis said the AMA "clearly accepts [doctors on the air] to provide accurate information on all matters of medical interest to the public. Physicians have a responsibility not only to their own patients but to the community as a whole."

Dr. Lewis' only caveat: "The doctors have a responsibility to protect the privacy of any patient on the air."

Although there is an acknowledged increase in the on-air doctor shows, the programs that are mainly medical in content are not the ones that are exciting station managers nationwide. Rather, it is the category of psychologist/therapist programing that is affecting the ratings.

There are more than 100 degree-holding practitioners, parapsychologists and a few cracker-barrel philosophers conducting shrink-type radio shows all over the U.S.

Although that figure is a rough estimate, there is no doubt about the growth in this area of radio programing.

Whether it is a case of genuine interest in human problems or electronic eavesdropping, these shows, most of them involving sex-related discussions, are credited with boosting the ratings of their stations in nearly all the markets they reach and reportedly have pulled some stations out of obscurity.

In Detroit, program director Michael Packer of WXYZ (am) Talk Radio, says that before the station went on the air with Sonya Friedman's afternoon call-in program it was 13th among radio stations in the market. Now WXYZ is among the top three. Dr. Friedman answers questions ranging from bed-wetting to what a wife should do if her husband wants to stay out all night. (Her answer: Demand the same privilege.) Dr. Friedman's book "Men Are Just Desserts" is now available.

Ruth Westheimer's "Sexually Speaking" on NBC's WYNY (fm) in New York has become No. 1 in its nighttime slot (against more than 70 other programs airing in the region at the time), and Dr. Westheimer is credited with helping boost the station to No. 2 in the New York market in the 25-to-49 age group. She takes on everything from "G-spot" queries to questions concerning masturbation. She also is a strong supporter of marriage and family.

"She makes us laugh at ourselves," says a fan of Ruth Westheimer.

Although Toni Grant of Los Angeles' KABC (am) has been criticized for her sharp tongue and abrupt manner, reportedly before her three-hour show went national, it was bringing in $2 million annually in ad revenues. Dr. Grant's salary is estimated to be more than $100,000. Sharp tongue or not, now her program is carried nationally on ABC Radio Networks.

Virtually all the radio psychologist show hosts consider themselves "educators."

The best-known of them—Drs. Grant, Friedman and Westheimer; Joy Browne of WITS (am) in Boston; Karen Shanor of WRC (am) in Washington; Karen Blaker of WOR (am) in New York; Jennifer James of KVI (am) in Seattle, and others making their marks in Florida and the Southwest—all have either psychology or related degrees.

In general, their success, they say, must be credited to answering a need for people to understand common problems, to come to grips with them rather than fear them.

Critics, some of them psychologists and psychiatrists themselves, say no meaningful advice can be given to complete strangers in a matter of minutes. They also say that hasty advice can do more harm than good and that the shows exploit serious personal problems for entertainment purposes.

"People have a right to find out if they are normal," retorts one of the therapists in defense of the shows, although there is little controversy that entertainment is the main motive.

What Alan Blum, editor of the New York "Journal of Medicine," would like to know is why most of the on-air therapists are women. "I haven't quite figured that one out," he says.

To be fair to the on-air therapists, more topics are dealt with than frequency of orgasm issues. Two of the more serious social problems discussed are drug addiction and alcoholism. At WWL (am) in New Orleans, two psychologists specialize in these areas. (Neither, incidentally, are women.) Pat Galloway has his own call-in program, and James Avery, a doctor, is a frequent guest on Dr. Galloway's show.

According to Lisa Cutito, WWL producer, teen age and adult alcoholism is becoming just as serious a problem as drugs, judging from the flow of calls coming in on these subjects. "Most of the callers are concerned about 'friends,'" says Ms. Cutito. "We think they're often really talking about family members. But in either case, they're usually advised to confront the person in trouble, but carefully. One woman who was worried about a friend always having a drink in her hand before playing tennis was advised to handle it this way: 'I could be wrong, but could you be drinking too much?' The point is to wake someone up to a problem he or she might have.

"There's always a risk. But the approach here is usually to suggest coming out with it and maybe helping someone." ■ ness pretty much come to us."

The competition is also headed off by the stresses of the business itself. Long-lived consulting companies are exceptions. Burns Media, at 13 years, is one of the oldest. Burkhart/Abrams, with 10 years experience, comes next. Many companies open up and close down in the space of a few years.

"It's a very difficult job, a very tedious job, and there are a lot of people who get in for a short time and leave," says Wayne Cornils, radio vp with the National Assn. of Broadcasters in Washington. "The more stations you have, the more travel you have to do, and that can be wearing. And there is the problem of people not taking your advice. The consultant is like a doctor. He writes a prescription and leaves. His station may or may not follow his suggestions as closely as they should, and if the ratings then fall the consultant gets the blame."

Another problem, Mr. Burkhart notes, is the cost of getting started. Ten years ago a consultant could pretty much get by with a good idea. But today research is demanded, and the cost of getting that is prohibitive.

For all that, the number of consultants, and consultant-dependent stations, is continuing to inch upward. And as that happened, complaints about a homogenization of radio sound have been leveled. Kent Burkhart, though, is not so willing to agree that radio has become a sea of mirror image stations. What has happened instead, he says, is that radio has broken itself into a spectrum of different formats. The diversity is not to be found in a single station, but across a dial that has a rock format station next to one with a jazz format and another with a country format.

"Now there are 40 stations in a major market, and you can find your music, your taste, on one of those channels," he says. "It didn't used to be that way. It used to be that a top 40 jock would play every tenth record jazz, every tenth record country, because there was no other place to hear it. But now you have a wide degree of formats, and they've done very well."

"It's nice to get nostalgic about the good old days," Lee Abrams adds. "But you forget that for every good disk jockey there were 10 horrible ones. I put my first format together because I couldn't find the music I wanted to hear anywhere on the radio. If you really look back at the good old days you'll find out they weren't that good after all. In fact, they were terrible." ■

Ad Age charts by Bob Zeni

Above are selected results from the first year of adWatch, a monthly measurement of consumer awareness of ads begun in April, 1982, by SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb.

Consumers say ads a little better

A national survey of consumers on U.S. advertising injects mixed results into the "image of advertising" discussion, a matter that is heating up now that the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies has labeled the matter an important concern for the industry.

While most U.S. consumers say creativity in advertising has improved in the last year, only 40% of consumers give it better marks for believability.

And though a slight majority of 52% say advertising has improved in providing useful information in the last year, less than half—46%—of consumers say it is doing a more effective job in making them want to buy what is advertised.

The telephone survey of 1,250 consumers by SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb., also found that advertising is faring much better among minorities. For example, 25% of blacks, Hispanics, Asians and native Americans surveyed said advertising's creativity is "much better" than a year ago, compared to only 17% of the total population who felt that way.#

'USA Today' scores well in AA survey

Nearly half of the people who have read USA Today, the national daily newspaper introduced by Gannett Co. last fall, are "very likely" or "somewhat likely" to be regular readers if it is available to them, a national survey conducted for ADVERTISING AGE indicates.

The survey, conducted in May by SRI Research Center, covered a national sample of 1,250 respondents. It found that 51% of the U.S. population had heard of the paper and that 46% of them had read it at least once. USA Today is available in 15 major markets.

Of the 46% who had read the paper, 21% said they would "very likely" become regular readers if the paper were available and 27% said they were "somewhat likely" to read it regularly.

Awareness was highest in California, Michigan, New York and Wisconsin, among people 25 to 34 and among higher-income groups.

People with household incomes of more than $40,000 also were more likely to have read the paper, but the strongest "very likely" response for future readership was made up of households earning $10,000 to $20,000 a year.#

said. "I remember feeling great animosity toward the X, Y or Z company."

"The tough part, which wasn't that tough, was the traveling," Mr. Upson said. "He was always off in Minneapolis or someplace. He'd average a couple of nights a week away. But he also made a real good effort to make up for time away."

The business has changed from the days their fathers were building their careers. "It had much more of a glamor image because my father was very much involved in television production," Mr. Bloede said. "He worked intimately with the 'Danny Thomas Show' and Lucille Ball, a lot of people who were big tv stars."

If any of his own three children (now ages six, four and one) wanted to go into advertising, the younger Mr. Bloede would be pleased—as pleased as his own father was when he signed on.

Not yet married (nuptials planned for August), Mr. Upson has no children to advise, but if or when he does, he too wouldn't be hesitant if his offspring expressed a wish to go into the business.

Indeed, it is happening all the time. Larry Hampel, son of D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius/New York president Alvin Hampel, just left Dancer Fitzgerald Sample to work at Scali, McCabe, Sloves. And Jimmy Jordan, 23, son of Jordan, Case & McGrath chairman James Jordan, just completed his second week as a copywriter at Benton & Bowles. Paul Kurnit, son of Shep Kurnit, chairman of Calet, Hirsch, Kurnit & Spector, is exec vp-director of client services at Griffin Bacal, and Susan Hagopian, daughter of N W Ayer chairman Louis Hagopian, is an account exec at J. Walter Thompson USA. John Bernbach, son of William Bernbach, runs DDB's London office.

The well-remembered names in the agency business live on.#—C.M.

Workshop to study models

New York—The faces of Candice Bergen, Brooke Shields and Cheryl Tiegs are practically synonymous with perfume, jeans and makeup. They are also synonymous with the Ford Models agency.

During a special luncheon presentation at the Advertising Age Creative Workshop, to be held here Aug. 9 to 12, Eileen and Jerry Ford, founders of Ford Models Inc., will discuss "Models in Advertising 1983."

The Fords will look at the history of models in advertising and the different roles they have played.

"Traditionally, models have been used as actresses, serving as part of the scene or the text that conveys the selling message," said Katie Ford, vp of the agency. This contrasts with using models to help create the product image, or, as Ms. Ford asserts, "The model becomes the image, as with Cheryl Tiegs and Cover Girl makeup."

Eileen and Jerry Ford will discuss how they find new talent and transform "farm girls into cover girls." They will also give their predictions for the hottest faces of the '80s and '90s.

Whether person or package, the more attractive the subject, the more attention it receives. In another session at the Creative Workshop, Elinor Selame, exec vp of Selame Design, presents, "Packaging Power—Corporate Identity and Product Recognition."

Ms. Selame will show how to integrate the visual elements of a marketing program into package design in order to build the product's image as well as boost the company's image. She will look at the value of packaging as part of a corporate and product identity program, how brand names can fight the battle against lower-price house and generic brands and will outline the elements of good package design.

These topics are among the more than 45 sessions to be attended by participants from over 20 countries in various advertising and marketing-related positions. For more information about the workshop, phone toll-free: 800-233-3435. In New York state, phone (212) 210-0296 or write to the Advertising Age Creative Workshop, 220 E. 42nd St., New York 10017. LEGISLATION TO COMBAT ALCOHOL INDUSTRY PROPAGANDA

Pressures mounting to curtail liquor advertising

By JOSEPH M. WINSKI

The advertising of alcoholic beverages, particularly beer and wine commercials on tv, is under increasing attack, fueled by an apparently grass-roots movement.

The issue—charges that the advertising contributes to excessive alcohol consumption and therefore should be curtailed or eliminated—was presumed dead just a few years ago.

Depending on how widespread the anti-advertising sentiment becomes, it's conceivable, in the opinion of Miller Brewing Co. executive George Woodward, that beer and wine commercials may go the way of cigaret commercials, banned from radio and tv since 1971.

"I think it's a very real threat—certainly one that the industry should be taking seriously," says Mr. Woodward, who is Miller's manager of government affairs, field operations. "It's a growing phenomenon. We're seeing and hearing a lot more about this than we were."

Consider the following:

- "Good Morning America" airs a weeklong series on drunk driving among teen agers. Host David Hartman says he is "stunned" by the number of letters and calls that follow, criticizing beer and wine commercials—a subject not even addressed in the reports.
- A group called the Wisconsin Citizens Council on Alcohol & Other Drug Abuse asks the state to ban or restrict the advertising of alcoholic beverages on tv, and to consider pushing for a similar national ban.
- In a letter to the Senate committee on commerce,

Substantiation proposals emerge

New FTC formula in analgesics case

By STANLEY E. COHEN

WASHINGTON—After 10 years of legal maneuvering, the Federal Trade Commission has settled on a split-level formula establishing the kinds of proof that three major analgesics marketers must have before making performance and comparison claims.

FTC chairman James C. Miller III indicated he supported the new formula in part to resolve the long dispute. But both he and commissioner George Douglas expressed hope that FTC's current top-to-bottom review of the ad substantiation burden on advertisers who make performance claims will produce some new ideas.

The split-level formula surfaced in decisions last week restricting claims for Bristol-Myers' Bufferin, Excedrin and Excedrin PM, and Sterling Drug's Bayer aspirin, Bayer children's aspirin, Vanquish, Cope and Midol.

If ultimately sustained, the formula would require that studies and research purportedly proving superior performance must be supported by two competent clinical tests. In other situations, where superior performance is asserted without reference to studies, the formula provides a more general

The market has changed

By NANCY GIGES

The analgesics market today is quite different from what it was 10 years ago. It differs not only in terms of how brands are advertised and which advertising agencies handle them, but in its size and makeup.

Since 1973, when the Federal Trade Commission began its deceptive-advertising action against three major pharmaceuticals companies, the market has tripled in size to over $1.2 billion. Acetaminophen (nonaspirin) now accounts for more than one-third of total analgesic sales, compared to less than 8% 10 years ago. The change is primarily due to the success and impact of Johnson & Johnson's

Industry asks flexibility

By RICHARD L. GORDON

WASHINGTON—Major advertising industry organizations are uncompromising in their support for prior substantiation of factual advertising claims, but are urging the Federal Trade Commission to be flexible when applying the principle to unanticipated "implied" claims.

Among the industry groups, the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies plunged most deeply into FTC's sweeping review of its ad substantiation program, presenting the commission an elaborate 144-page filing that included a survey attempting to gauge the cost and impact of the substantiation program on Four A's members.

Last Friday was the deadline for responding to a lengthy, voluntary FTC questionnaire seeking clues not only on how substantiation affects the industry but also on how consumers react to ad claims and the level of proof they expect advertisers to have.

The responses will be studied by FTC staffers, who will later report back to the commission on possible changes in its approach to substantiation issues.

The Four A's filing, the product of a task force led by association chairman Paul Harper of Needham, Harper & Steers, also went beyond FTC's shopping list to argue that the commission needs to recognize more clearly the limits of ad agency responsibility for verifying information provided by the client. The American Advertising Federation touched on the same issue, but in less detail.

It is "unrealistic," Four A's said, to require that agencies become "independent guarantors of what-

Colgate tests toothpaste in pump dispenser

NEW YORK—Colgate-Palmolive has moved into test markets with Colgate toothpaste in a pump dispenser. The product, an apparent competitor for Minnetonka's entry into the business with Henkel's Check-Up dentifrice (AA, May 9), is in Minneapolis and Bakersfield, Cal. Tv commercials and print ads by Ted Bates Advertising/New York note that the product eliminates the mess and provides toothpaste "at your fingertips."

Kellogg, P&G, Sears, CBS respond to FTC review

WASHINGTON—Kellogg urged FTC to create a substantiation "safe harbor rule" that would shield from prosecution advertisers that discuss suggested, but scientifically unproven, links between food nutrition, i.e., high-fiber foods, and health. FTC's ad substantiation review (see story above) also drew comment late Friday from Procter & Gamble, which criticized FTC "fishing expeditions" for ad backup material and said FTC should act only when it has reason to believe a claim is deceptive. Sears called for an end to litigation "gamesmanship" in FTC ad substantiation reviews and said the commission should instruct its staff to interpret "implied" ad claims as a "reasonable" consumer would. CBS said network ad clearance departments and other industry self-regulation bodies "are a valuable supplement to—but not a substitute for—the FTC's advertising substantiation doctrine."

CHICAGO—Farberware led an array of innovative products at last week's National Housewares Manufacturers Assn. show. Its new electronic cooker creates an entirely new kitchen appliance category.

Apparently preparing for the nine-month hiatus that will occur until the shows resume on a new spring/fall schedule, housewares marketers showed a substantial number of new products.

Farberware's new electronically controlled Ultra Chef was the chief attention-grabber, although many buyers indicated that its $450 retail

Upfront net tv buying spree

By CRAIG REISS

New York—The dam burst in the upfront network tv market last week, with NBC reporting more than $500 million in upfront sales and ABC saying it has $450 million in upfront deals on hold for final signing this week.

All three networks reported price increases were ranging between 10% and 14%, depending on the individual programing mix required and the prices paid by an advertiser last year.

The final price range is below the initial projections made by network sources, but higher than expected by advertisers who were proclaiming earlier this year that they would not settle for double-digit price hikes (AA, July 11).

More than $100 million of the ABC total was written on Thursday of last week, with the ABC sales and planning departments burning the midnight oil until 4 a.m. Friday in order to handle the crunch.

CBS vp-sales Jerome Dominus declined to say how much CBS has sold, but said the network was "right on target" with sales projections. Mr. Dominus said his staff has been working until midnight every night to handle the volume of business, which has been compounded because of the unexpected early rush of daytime sales.

"The daytime market is wide open, too," said Mr. Dominus, noting that daytime sales usually commence immediately after upfront prime time sales are finished. "I can't explain why the daytime money is coming in at the same time as prime time," he added.

Robert Blackmore, senior vp-sales at NBC-TV, said advertisers, encouraged by reports of increased automotive and retail sales in recent weeks, came into the upfront

Syndie compromise near

By MAURINE CHRISTOPHER

Active syndication? No. Financial interest, negotiable with the producer and to include shared revenues from off-network rerun sales? Yes.

This is how the compromise solution to the $1 billion battle over tv programing control between the networks and their suppliers seems to be shaping up.

The Federal Communications Commission, which must resolve the question, is expected to vote to propose seeking fast comment before its August hiatus.

The expected vote presumably would be in favor of asking for comments, rather than a vote to approve a compromise now.

While the draft to be considered on Aug. 4 still is being hammered out, it is likely to blend the suggestions from the Justice Department, FCC commissioner James Quello, Group W and others into a plan that would offer something for everyone. This would be a far cry from repeal of the domestic syndication and co-production strictures that were imposed upon the networks in the 1970s.

Although FCC chairman Mark Fowler favors repeal, Mr. Quello, the only former broadcaster on the commission, has supported a middle-ground approach all along, and some station groups, such as Storer Broadcasting, have not opposed letting tv's Big 3 have a share of the profits, if any, from prime time shows running on their networks. Some broadcasters have suggested ABC, CBS and NBC should be allowed only to play the role of silent partners or passive, minority investors in entertainment programs acquired from others.

Many stations and virtually all of the most successful program suppliers want to keep the financial interest ban as well as the syndication barrier.

Of course, no one can predict precisely what will

Who shot into market with Dallas cigarets?

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

New York—Tracking down a new cigaret called Dallas Super Lights has turned up more plot twists than are found in a tv season of "Dallas" episodes.

That Dallas cigarets are being sold in about 10 retail outlets around Manhattan via buy-one/get-one-free retail displays is the only unassailable fact that is known about the brand. From that point, things begin to get murky.

For starters, packs of the product list the maker as "Dallas Tobacco Co. of Dallas, Tex." But the product was manufactured and shipped to a distributor here by Durham, N.C.-based Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co., whose salesmen were seen fussing over the

FCC will end role in rating tiffs

Washington—The Federal Communications Commission decided last week that squabbles over the misuse of ratings data and broadcast station coverage maps should be left to the Federal Trade Commission or to private court litigation.

Since 1963, FCC has had policy statements advising broadcasters of their obligations not to misuse ratings for promotional purposes. In addition, a 1969 policy statement dealt with the use of misleading and exaggerated coverage maps by stations.

The FCC, which is seeking to eliminate unnecessary regulation, said last week that it does not want to be involved in regulating essentially commercial matters like ratings abuse and the misuse of coverage maps. But it said it would continue to take FTC cease-and-desist orders into consideration in determining whether a licensee operated in the public interest during license-renewal hearings.

Broadcasters will continue to be held to account if they file misleading coverage maps with FCC, but the commission said advertisers have the capacity to verify coverage claims and have access to private remedies should abuses occur.#

Coen details surge in ad spending

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

NEW YORK—The economy is getting better and it is getting better sooner than expected, according to Robert Coen, senior vp at McCann-Erickson. He said advertising is sharing in the boom.

Last fall, Mr. Coen, whose advertising expenditure compilations are widely followed, predicted advertising expenditures would be up 9.2% in 1983. Now, seven months into the year, Mr. Coen has revised that projection in a report presented last week. He now believes advertising expenditures will be up 11% to $73.8 billion, and in 1984, up 12.2% to $82.9 billion.

"The economic recovery has come on faster than we expected," Mr. Coen said. Of the gains this year, the biggest increase is coming in local advertising.

He estimates total local spending (chiefly newspapers) will hit $32.2 billion, an 11.7% increase and total national will be up 10.4% to $41.7 billion.

In 1984, an Olympics and election year, local advertisers will be spending $36.2 billion, a 12.5% increase, and national advertisers will be spending $46.7 billion, a 12% gain.

For 1983 Mr. Coen estimates magazine revenues will be up 11% to $4.1 billion; national newspapers up 8% to $2.65 billion; network tv up 11% to $6.9 billion; spot tv up 8.5% to $4.7 billion; network radio up 20% to $305 million; spot radio up 9% to $1 billion; direct mail up 13% to $11.7 billion, and other national media spending will be up 8%, to a total $10.4 billion.

When Mr. Coen made his forecast in November, he estimated an 11% increase in national broadcast, an 8% increase in national print and 9% more in other national advertising media.

In the first five months of 1983, network tv ad revenues were up 11%. In the first quarter, spot tv revenues have been up an average of 10%.

Magazines are doing far better than Mr. Coen predicted last year. "I didn't think page volume would return until mid-'83," Mr. Coen said. Instead, in the first five months, pages were up an average of 5% and revenue

'USA Today' may expand into Europe

By RICHARD L. GORDON

WASHINGTON—Gannett Co. is studying European distribution for USA Today and says it has received unsolicited feelers from two European newspaper publishers.

USA Today president Vincent Spezzano declined to identify the interested Europeans, but said they will call on Gannett executives later this year. Mr. Spezzano said he and Gannett chairman and president Allen H. Neuharth also will be in Europe in October to address a meeting of European newspaper publishers in Marseilles.

Hints from Mr. Neuharth that he sees a possible future for USA Today in foreign markets—he's spoken of a "preliminary" study of possible overseas print sites in Europe and the Pacific—have drawn little public attention, and Mr. Spezzano insisted last week there are "no specific plans yet.

"That's not to say it couldn't get serious in another three to six months," he added. "It's very much on the table; we just haven't reached that part of the table yet," the USA Today president said. "We have a lot of

Y&R contender for Ford Europe

By DENNIS CHASE

Young & Rubicam is in the running for $45 million worth of Ford of Europe business if, as many suspect, Ford decides to make a change in assignment of the non-British portion of the account.

Y&R emerged as a strong contender for this business, which now is with J. Walter Thompson Co., when it was invited to a meeting to be held next week to discuss Ford's corporate image in Europe and whether its corporate ad campaigns need more coordination, sources say.

That meeting, which JWT and Ogilvy & Mather (which handles Ford in the U.K.) also will attend, ostensibly will not cover automotive advertising.

But the agencies know that how well their officials discuss Ford's European corporate image is bound to have an impact on the marketer's thinking about the automobile accounts, and they are going all out, sources say.

None of the agencies is talking publicly about the competition for the Ford of Europe account, and a decision is considered months away. The meeting has been organized informally and requires

USFL beats 2-minute ad warning

NEW YORK—The national ratings for the U.S. Football League playoff games on July 9 and 10 seem to have won the league the confidence of some of its advertisers, with Anheuser-Busch now saying it intends to be back next season.

While awaiting the results from its championship game played in prime time Aug. 17, the USFL was enthused that its preliminary round of playoff games showed enough ratings strength to keep the interest of advertisers. The July 9 and 10 games both won their respective time periods.

The Saturday game between Chicago and Philadelphia drew a 5.0 rating and 18 share, beating NBC's "30 Rock," 3.6/14, and baseball, 4.5/16, and CBS' "World University Games," 4.5/15. On Sunday, the USFL game between Oakland and Michigan got a 5.9/19, while NBC's "Sportsworld" drew 5.1/16 and CBS' second day of the University Games got a 3.9/13.

Jerry Solomon, exec vp at A-B's agency, D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius, said earlier that Budweiser would reconsider continuing its ad participation in USFL next year if the ratings for the playoff games did not show improvement over the season. The final regular-season USFL game became the lowest rated prime time program of the year. "We have no complaints," he said after the start of the playoffs. "Depending on ABC's pricing next year, we expect to be back."#

First worldwide survey of leading researchers

By JACK HONOMICHL

research beat

Six of the largest research organizations in the world are based in the U.S., with four coming from Europe.

That statement is in answer to a perennial question that arises upon publication of the annual review of the largest U.S. research companies (AA, May 23): "How do the largest U.S. companies compare to those headquartered in other countries?"

Before digesting the 1982 revenue estimates in this first compilation of the Top 10 research organizations worldwide, consider:

- Many of the organizations have total revenues far larger than those listed; this ranking is based on just that part of their volume attributable to marketing/advertising/public opinion research. Even though many of these companies are public, that distinction isn't always as clear-cut as one might like. The company-by-company profiles that follow note the relative importance of research in each organization.
- There are currency conversion values (vis-a-vis the U.S. dollar) to consider, and during the past 18 months these have varied significantly as the U.S. dollar has stiffened. This 1982 ranking uses for the British pound sterling an average conversion rate of $1.556 to the pound; for the West German dm, I have used 2.4266 to the dollar. Still, there is a lot of conversion bounce in these numbers, especially when you consider the number of countries in which some of these organizations do business. (IMS International leads in that respect with operations in 34 countries.)

All things considered, consider these 1982 revenues as order-of-magnitude estimates—but certainly close enough to construct a relative ranking.

It was especially frustrating to try to get a fix on the large Japanese research organizations. One thing seems certain: Those well-known Japanese organizations that specialize in marketing/advertising research—

Research Top 10

Dentsu Research, Chuohchosasha (Central Research Service), the Japan Marketing Research Assn. or Video-Audience Research—are not nearly large enough to make a worldwide top 10 listing (nor is the largest French company, SOFRES).

One enigma: The huge Nomura Research Institute in Tokyo, which has revenues in the range of $50 million. Nomura does economic forecasting and social research, much of which is based on secondary source data. But it also does a considerable amount of custom survey research. What per cent that is of the total Nomura volume is unknown, but there is no reason to believe it is large enough to get NRI on the Top 10 list.

1. A.C. Nielsen Co.—U.S. Of total revenues for the 12 months ending Nov. 30, 1982, 66.2%—or $433.1 million—came from marketing/advertising research activities. Nielsen set up its first foreign subsidiary in Great Britain in 1939; today it has research operations in 25 countries. Basically these services are store-audit programs to develop market-size measurements, share of market for brands and tv audience measurement systems—either on a national or local-market basis. Nielsen is a public company.

2. IMS International—U.S. Of total revenues for 1982, about 74% —or $124.8 million—came from marketing research activities in 34 countries. Basically this activity consists of market-size and brand-share measures in fields of interest to the pharmaceutical/medical and healthcare industry. IMS is a public company.

3. Selling Areas-Marketing Inc.—U.S. SAMI's basic activity, available in the U.S. only, is to amalgamate warehouse withdrawal data to produce continuous movement figures on thousands of individual package goods items sold through food stores, separately for each of 48 marketing areas. Revenues for 1982 were estimated at $85 million. SAMI is a wholly owned subsidiary of Time Inc.

4. Arbitron Ratings Co.—U.S. Arbitron's basic business is local-market measurements of radio and tv audiences, mostly via mail diaries and meter-equipped tv sets. They only operate in the U.S. Revenues for 1982 were estimated at $80.3 million. Arbitron is a wholly owned subsidiary of Control Data Corp.

5. AGB Research PLC—U.K. For the fiscal year ending April 30, 1983, this London-based conglomerate is expected to have total revenues of about $93.4 million, of which about 79%—or $73.6 million —will be attributable to research activities in 20 countries. These figures will reflect, for the first time, the approximately $22 million gained through the acquisition of

GRAPHEXcitement

Inspect printing's future at the graphic arts show of the year.

Lasers. Computers. Telecommunications. Presses. Tomorrow's printing industry will rely on an arsenal of new tools that were science fiction only a few years ago. And for four days this September, Chicago's immense McCormick Place will be transformed into a pulse-quickening showcase for everything that's the latest and the best.

It's GRAPH EXPO 83, and in both number of exhibitors and advance visitor registrations, it's already the biggest U.S. graphic arts show ever. There will be more than a half-million square feet of displays, featuring everything from word processing to presses to binding, representing over 400 different companies. If you want to see, touch, and compare all the things you'll need to succeed in the 1980's, GRAPH EXPO 83 is the place to be.

GRAPH EXPO 83 will also feature a series of informative, educational conferences, and seminars produced by the Graphic Arts Council of North America.

If you are in any way involved with the graphic arts industry. . . be at GRAPH EXPO 83! For more information call (703) 734-8285.

Research Top 10

the U.S. research company, NFO Research. They would not yet reflect the recent acquisition (in part) of the Survey Research Group in Asia, which will take AGB's activities into six more countries. Basic AGB activities are consumer panels, tv audience measurement systems (mostly via meter-equipped tv sets), omnibus surveys and media research. It is a public company.

6. Burke Marketing Services—U.S. This company consists of (1) the Test Marketing Group—tv campaign testing and controlled marketing labs; (2) BASES—market modeling; (3) Professional Services—educational seminars; (4) Telecom Research—physiological measures of advertising stimuli; (5) Burke Marketing Research—pre- and post-tv copy testing and custom survey research, and (6) Burke Canada, which accounts for about $1.4 million of the company's revenues. In addition there is a Burke International, a joint venture with Infratest, a West German company also on the Top 10 list, in which Burke owns a 5% interest. Burke is a privately held corporation.

7. Research International—U.K. This organization, which specializes in custom, ad hoc survey research, operates in 29 countries, and there are over 800 fulltime employes. Headquarters are in London. In some countries, RI conducts omnibus surveys and diary mail panels. It is a wholly owned subsidiary of Unilever Ltd., but less than 40% of its work comes from Unilever subsidiaries around the world. RI's total revenues in 1982: $48.2 million.

8. Infratest Forschung GmbH & Co. KG—West Germany This Munich-based company and its four subsidiaries had revenues of $32.2 million in 1982. Infratest operates in five European countries, and there are about 465 employes, about 225 of whom are professionals. Infratest specializes in ad hoc consumer surveys, advertising and media research, omnibus surveys and political/public opinion polling. It is privately held and was founded in 1947.

(Infratest revenues do not include the partial acquisition of Research Services Ltd., a survey company in the U.K., a transaction that took place in early 1983. Also, Infratest and GFK [see below] jointly owned a consumer panel operation and Infratest sold its share to GFK in early 1983. That transaction is not reflected in either the Infratest or GFK numbers. Also, Infratest owns 5% of Burke Marketing Services.)

9. Market Facts Inc.—U.S. This public company had revenues of $25.4 million in 1982, not including those of a Canadian subsidiary, which is 50% owned by the parent. If included, that would add about $2.4 million to its revenues. Market Facts' main U.S. activities are the Consumer Mail Panel, Marketest store-audit services, shopping mall facilities, WATS telephone interviewing and ad hoc survey research.

10. GFK Nurnberg Gesellschaft F Konsum und Absatzforschung & V.—West Germany This organization, which operates in six European countries, had revenues of $23.9 million in 1982. Headquarters are in Nuremberg, and there are about 565 fulltime employes. GFK specializes in a broad range of research activities: Ad hoc survey research; advertising research; syndicated surveys; package and product testing; industrial, financial, medical and agricultural marketing research. Founded in 1934, it is technically a trade association, and its shares cannot be sold to outsiders.

■ During 1982, these 10 organizations had, in total, marketing/advertising/public opinion research revenues of about $978.6 million, and the Nielsen alone accounted for 44% of that.

I should like to thank those people who have—over a period of months—helped to document nearly 100 non-U.S. research organizations. Special thanks to Eileen Cole, chief executive officer of Research International; Wolfgang Ernst, ceo of Infratest Forschung GmbH & Co.; Morten M. Lenrow, director of international marketing research, PepsiCo; Jack Brown, chairman of Burke Marketing Services, and Ms. Gunilla Broadbent, vp-director of INRA at Starch INRA Hooper.#

Amana, FTC settle on ad safety claims

WASHINGTON—Amana Refrigeration and its agency, Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, have signed Federal Trade Commission settlement agreements which establish stringent procedures governing their use of safety claims and survey information.

Under the agreements, which are still subject to public comment, the company and the agency may not use test or survey evidence to advertise microwave ovens or other products unless results are reported accurately.

The agreements require them to retain all materials relied on, as well as adverse information, for the year period. FCB is permitted to rely on data supplied by qualified outsiders, including clients, so long as the information is in writing and is endorsed by a person who has appropriate training and experience.

Signing of the agreement represented a change of heart by Amana, which vowed stiff resistance when FTC issued its complaint last October (AA, Oct. 11). At that time the company's spokesman contended that no one was hurt by the ads and that FTC would seem to have more important things to do.

The agreement with FCB announced last week was the first word that FTC was also proceeding against the ad agency which had handled the disputed ads.#

Coen details spending surge

was up 10% over the same period in 1982.

Newspaper advertising has "done surprisingly well," according to Mr. Coen. In the first quarter, classified advertising was up 15% and retail was up 12%. National advertising is up 6%. "The help wanted and real estate advertising hasn't really boiled up yet," Mr. Coen said, adding that he expects comebacks in both categories later in the year. Also, retail advertising has undergone a resurgence in the first quarter.

But newspapers have lost some cigaret and automobile advertising—two major categories for the medium. According to Mr. Coen's calculations, cigaret advertising in newspapers in the first quarter was down 9% and automobiles 3%. "Cigaret promotions are way down, compared with the first quarter of 1982," Mr. Coen said. Referring to automobiles, he noted rebate advertising has been shifted over to the dealers, replaced by more image advertising. The greatest gain in newspaper advertising can be found in preprint newspaper inserts, up a substantial 33% in the first quarter of 1983. Moderate increases have been made in newspaper schedules by airlines (1%), foods (2%) and liquor (4%).

The outlook for 1983

Network radio spending is expected to gain the most in listed categories with a 20% increase.

A medium that really has taken off is the third-class presorted commercial mail, he reported. "Mail advertising is strong and will continue to be strong," Mr. Coen said. In the first quarter of 1983, 4.8 billion pieces of mail were distributed, a 14% increase over the same quarter a year before. Total postage added up to $444 million, another 14% jump.

Examining the various product categories, Mr. Coen pointed out a shift to more traditional image advertising from price and rebate campaigns. Also, advertisers are looking more seriously at alternative media than they ever have, he said. For instance, led by Procter & Gamble, cleaners/waxes advertisers are spending 52% more in spot tv, 12% more in network tv and 17% less in magazines.

On the other hand, food advertisers are spending 25% more in magazines, 6% more in spot tv and 3% more in network tv, as compared with the same quarter a year ago. For the first three months of 1983, automobile companies increased network tv spending by 33%, magazine spending by 24% and spot tv by 8%. Candy/soft drinks increased spot tv spending by 25%, magazine by 10% and decreased network tv spending by 5%. Drug remedies spent 16% more in network, 3% more in spot tv and 13% in magazines, while toiletries increased network spending by 9%, spot tv by 12% and magazine spending stayed the same. Restaurant advertisers increased network and spot tv spending by 13% each and decreased their magazine allotment by 7%.

Home computers and videogame marketers have taken to advertising in a big way. The companies increased spot tv spending by 141%, network tv spending by 103% but they decreased magazine spending by 34%. Airlines shifted out of network (down 10%) into spot tv (up 23%) and magazines (up 29%). Records/tapes advertisers spent 262% more on network tv, 19% less in spot tv and 14% more in magazines.

Major appliances and household furnishings, industries hard hit by the recession, cut back on network tv spending by 39% and 26%, respectively. Household furnishings marginally increased spending elsewhere—5% more in spot tv and 1% more in magazines. The major appliances also cut back in spot tv (decreased spending 11%) but increased magazine spending by 24% in the first quarter. Wine marketers cut back on network tv by 11%, on magazines by 13% and increased spot tv spending by 2%.

Cigaret companies increased their spending in magazines by 35%. Beer advertisers invested 46% more in network tv than in the first quarter of 1982; 5% more in spot tv, and 16% more in magazines. Pet food companies increased media spending across the board—34% more in spot tv, 23% more in network tv and 13% more in magazines.

Two industries that cut back considerably on ad spending in the first quarter were liquor and petroleum. Liquor budgets were 20% lower in magazines in the first quarter. Oil companies spent 57% less in network tv, 51% less in magazines and 35% more in spot tv.

"Our December, 1982, projections for 1983 expenditures were made at a time when the economy was at its lowest point and the exact timing of the recovery was in doubt," Mr. Coen said. "It is now apparent that the economy and advertising spending both have been on the uptrend for most of the first half of 1983. This will prove to be a year of economic expansion and one in which advertising also will show continued improvement."#

New Orleans fair tells execs: Step right up

By JEREMY FEIGELSON

New York—New Orleans will play host to next year's World's Fair, and the World's Fair wants to play host to big-name corporate sponsors.

So fair officials came here last week to play host to ad executives, who can persuade their clients to buy a stake in the event.

"When you measure the fair against the traditional forms of advertising, we're very competitive on a cost-per-thousand basis. We feel we have an excellent product," said Jeffrey Stack, fair vp-marketing, before his presentation at the Grand Hyatt Hotel last week.

Corporate sponsors already lined up include Delta Air Lines, Coca-

Whitehall Labs plans major painkiller effort

By NANCY GIGES

American Home Products, continuing its search for a painkiller to combat market leader Tylenol, is preparing plans for over-the-counter sales of the country's biggest-selling prescription remedy for arthritis.

The drug is ibuprofen, which AHP's Whitehall Laboratories has been licensed to sell over the counter in the U.S. by Boots Co., a British company that holds the worldwide patent on the drug. AHP plans to call the new product Advil and sell it in 200mg tablets, about half the strength in which it is sold under prescription.

AHP must obtain Food & Drug Administration approval. It will state its case before the FDA's arthritis advisory committee on Aug. 18 and 19, along with Upjohn Co., another Boots licensee that apparently plans otc sales of ibuprofen. Upjohn sells ibuprofen in the U.S. as a prescription drug called Motrin.

FDA approval would have broad implications not only for the $1.2 billion otc analgesic market, but for the nonsteroidal antiarthritic prescription drug business, which also may have annual sales of about $1.2 billion. Ibuprofen belongs to the nonsteroidal family, a class of drugs often prescribed for mild to moderate pain caused by a number of conditions.

More importantly for AHP, approval might mean that it finally would have found a formidable competitor to Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol, which unseated AHP's Anacin as the top-selling painkiller soon after entering the mass market in the 1970s. Tylenol has a commanding 30% share of the analgesic market, to No.

Agency profits hold up

New York—The American Assn. of Advertising Agencies says its member agencies weathered the 1982 recession better than they survived the less severe one in 1974.

Last year, as the recession took its toll on the nation's economy, net profits after taxes for incorporated agencies averaged 3.45% of gross income, according to the Four A's latest study of members' costs and profits. A year earlier, net profits after taxes averaged 3.55%.

The decrease in '82 was attributed chiefly to higher rent and insurance for employe benefits. But net profit as a percentage of billings averaged 0.85% last year, up 2.4% from the 1981 average of 0.83%. Noting that the the best of the last 10 years for agency performance was in 1979, when net profit as a percentage of billings for incorporated agencies reached 1.03%, Leonard Matthews, Four A's president, commented: "The good news is that net profit dropped only to 0.83% in 1981, early in the recession, whereas it dropped to 0.65% in the recession of 1974. We feel that agencies have fared better in what has been, for many businesses, a more severe recession."

The net profit for all agencies in the survey—incorporated and unincorporated— showed a slight rise in 1982. But the Four A's said that, because of different tax regulations applying to unincorporated businesses, it prefers to concentrate on the incorporated agency profit averages. Incorporated agencies ac-

Mahoney-less ads ready

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

Esmark Inc.'s sweetened offer for Norton Simon Inc. apparently has locked up its takeover of the New York-based conglomerate. It has also led to the expected resignation of NSI chairman David J. Mahoney.

Mr. Mahoney, in London when his resignation was announced, gets up to $12 million to cover the five years remaining on his contract, plus another $23.5 million from stock options and other bonuses covered in the agreement hammered out between the two companies.

In a statement, Mr. Mahoney, who had been the very visible advertising spokesman for NSI's Avis unit, said he would continue to remain active in the business community and would "continue to work to advance the public policy and charitable causes to which I have long been committed; better healthcare, helping disadvantaged youth, good government and promoting equal opportunity for all men and women."

Having put in several weeks of hard work, McCaffrey & McCall, agency for Avis, is likely to be on the air with a replacement campaign early in August, sources said. The agency has been working on several campaigns which did not include Mr. Mahoney, who became the company's spokesman in May, 1982. Avis execs declined to specify when the new Avis campaign would break or what it would say. In actuality, Mr. Mahoney's role as spokesman ended late June when the NSI board decided to accept Esmark's bid.

Hertz is also scheduled to break a

Equitable Life taps D'Arcy for $10 million drive

New York—The Equitable Life Assurance Society of the U.S. has appointed D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius to handle a new corporate-image campaign with a $10 million to $12 million ad budget. D'Arcy beat out Benton & Bowles, the other finalist. There is no previous agency.

ABC, NBC upfront buys top $1.2 billion so far

New York—ABC-TV and NBC-TV reported closing last Friday with more than $600 million each in upfront sales for the 1983-84 broadcast season. CBS-TV has not released its upfront sales figures. The upfront market pace, running a week ahead of last year, is expected to conclude by this weekend. The daytime upfront sales pace also has quickened, with ABC-TV reporting more than $200 million in sales. ABC-TV also reports total network tv spending appears to be 12% higher than last year, with upfront prices ranging 10% to 14% above those in 1982-83.

Barclay judge questions FTC tests

By RICHARD L. GORDON

WASHINGTON—The federal judge who will pass on Barclay's ultralow-tar ad claims said last week he also wonders whether the whole Federal Trade Commission testing procedure is so faulty it perpetuates an industrywide deception.

U.S. district court Judge Gerhard Gesell's comments came July 21, after a Brown & Williamson attorney called his attention to new research, reported that day on the front page of the Washington Post. The report, published in the New England Journal of Medicine, contended that FTC's nicotine ratings for all brands of cigarets are "misleading," because there is no correlation with the actual amount of nicotine delivered.

Judge Gesell, who said the story had been "all over the [tv] news" the night before, was given a copy of the article by B&W lawyers.

Later, Brown & Williamson lost the first legal skirmish in the case when the judge ordered four days of hearings, beginning Sept. 12, to decide whether a preliminary injunction halting Barclay's 1mg tar/99% tar-free claims is justified.

B&W, which has fought off FTC action against Barclay for more than a year, had hoped to delay the case at least until November, when a full trial on the issues could be scheduled.

FTC contends that while Barclay delivers 1mg tar on its testing machine, tar levels actually delivered to smokers are much higher —perhaps 3mgs to 7mgs because smokers routinely crush critical air vents used in Barclay's filter design.

The air provided through the vents dilutes the smoke, lowering the amounts of tar and nicotine delivered.

While only Barclay's tar claims technically are at issue, Judge Gesell told FTC lawyers he wanted a precise explanation of how Barclay's 1mg claim was deceptive.

"It does seem to me that if all the other cigarets that meet [FTC's] test don't actually gauge the tar delivered," he said, "then what we're engaged in is an 'industry deception.' "

A B&W lawyer contended FTC has no basis for asserting that there is an important "public health interest" in stopping the 1mg claim, citing a lack of data showing a 1mg cigaret is more harmful than a 3mg cigaret.

The judge brushed the contention aside as "an argument I won't accept. . .You obviously think 1mg is a vital part of your merchandising campaign." The B&W attorney conceded that many smokers do believe that low-tar cigarets are "better" than high-tar cigarets.

Just how Judge Gesell, an outspoken jurist, rates FTC's 16-year-old cigaret rating system is likely to have considerable impact on the commission's own consideration of a possible overhaul, a senior FTC official said.

Should the judge be broadly critical of the

New kink in cigaret caper

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

NEW YORK—The second chapter in the deepening Dallas cigaret mystery began to unfold last week aboard a jet carrying agency executives Marty Solow and Jim Durfee to Cleveland on business.

As Mr. Solow turned to the second page of the July 18 issue of ADVERTISING AGE, he was startled to read that Liggett & Myers Tobacco had played a hand in helping London Tobacco Co. get packs of Dallas Super Lights into several retail outlets here as part of an apparent trademark registration procedure.

Mr. Solow and Mr. Durfee, principals in the Durfee & Solow agency here, had good reason to stare at each other in disbelief. On April 14, 1982—they remembered only too well—they had traveled to Durham, N.C., to meet with three L&M execs. The purpose of the visit: To present speculative proposals and rough ads for two cigarets, one of them named Dallas.

They maintained that the Dallas name was a way to convey to smokers the image of the modern cowboy in a powerful, macho but urbane way. And, they argued, the ruboff from the hit CBS tv series of the same name might also prove to be beneficial.

Back in his office late last week, Mr. Solow recalled, "They kept our proposal for many months until we asked them to please return it. They seemed to be un-

Magazines hit in 'slavery' suit

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

NEW YORK—A dozen major publishers are being sued, along with four field subscription agencies, in the latest attack on the traveling-crew method of selling magazines.

These operations are "serving only the financial greed of the magazine publishing industry," according to a suit filed in U.S. district court here, as they allegedly involve "a pattern of racketeering activity" with "cult-like groups of youth" peddling magazines via "deceptive sales techniques."

The suit, filed on behalf of five persons aged 19 to 23 who claim they were virtual slaves of the agencies, seeks punitive and compensatory damages that could amount to $100 million.

"The various publisher defendants all have actual knowledge of this scheme," the suit charges, "and have permitted it to continue, in order to generate increased circulation for their magazines."

Named in the suit are these publishers: ABC Cos., Atlantic Monthly Inc., CBS Inc., Esquire Associates, Hearst Corp., Johnson Publishing Co., McCall Publishing Co., New York Times Co., Petersen Publishing Co., Times Mirror Co., Triangle Publications and Ziff-Davis Publishing Co. All are based, or have sales offices, in New York.

"There is no real basis for the involvement of the publishers in the suit," said Alison Anthoine, assistant general counsel for Ziff-Davis. ABC, Atlantic, CBS and New York Times Co. declined comment because a pending legal matter is involved.

The agencies named as defendants are Circulation Builders of America, Arlington, Tex.; National Circulating Co., Gettysburg, Pa., and North American Book Sales and Solar Circulation, both Michigan City, Ind. Also named are their owners and employes. They have, according to the suit, "lured thou-

Sensuality reigns in Remy ads

By GAY JERVEY

NEW YORK—Young trend-setting consumers, already singled out as the target for Remy Martin cognac, now will be targeted in new ads seeking to convey the "sense of Remy."

Importer Remy Martin Amerique will spend roughly $5 million over the next year, primarily in national and regional magazines, as well as outdoor. The current print schedule calls for buys in predominantly upscale, at times narrowly targeted magazines—American Film, Audubon, Cuisine, Ebony, Esquire, Forbes, Foreign Affairs, Fortune, Geo, Golf Digest, Money, National Review, Natural History, The New Republic, Opera News, Ski, Town & Country, Vanity Fair and Vogue.

The campaign currently sports five copy points: "Savor the sense of Remy," "Arouse your sense of Remy," "Awaken your sense of Remy," "Release your sense of Remy" and "Kindle your sense of Remy."

Visuals feature models, both black and white, shot in profile or semi-silhouette. They gaze at each other—and the glass of cognac—with telling looks. In the corner is count for most of the agencies reporting to the survey, it noted.

The 292 Four A's members represented in the 1982 report showed an average net profit of 3.75% of gross income, up from a 3.67% average among 279 reporting agencies a year earlier.

Agencies reported that of their total expenses last year, 8.47% of gross income, the all-time high, went to pay rent, light and depreciation; 4.40% went for taxes (other than U.S. income taxes), 17.27% went for other operating expenses; 60.79% went for payroll (the same percentage as in 1981 and below the 1980 average of 61.27%); 1.86% went into retirement plan payments (down from 2.29% in '81), and 2.11% was for insurance benefits (up from 1.96% a year earlier).

Mr. Matthews noted that profits as a percentage of gross income have ranged narrowly between 3% and 4% for six of the last 10 years and between 4% and 5% for the remaining four (1976, 1977, 1978, 1979). He explained that profit averages vary by agency size groups, tending to run somewhat higher for the larger agencies. The average profit percentage ranged last year from a low of 2.80% for smaller agencies all the way up to 8.32% of gross income for the larger agency grouping. Average profit as a percentage of billing ranged from 0.43% to a high of 1.35% among reporting agencies.

Insurance payments for employe benefit plans (group life, major medical, disability, etc.) have increased in every year but one since 1950, Four A's reported. Now at 2.11%, another all-time high, this cost amounted to 13/100 of 1% of gross income in 1950. Total expenses in 1982, as a percentage of gross income, came to 94.90%, down slightly from 1981's 95.02% but still the second-highest percentage of the last 10 years.#

FTC tests questioned

system after reviewing the Barclay case, it could trigger a chain of events that might not please cigaret industry leaders R.J. Reynolds Tobacco and Philip Morris USA.

The two companies instigated the FTC action against Barclay two years ago, contending the B&W brand "fooled" the testing machine and deceived consumers who believe all 1mg-tar cigarets deliver roughly the same amount of tar.

Both companies are pressing FTC to make only a minor technical "fix" to the testing machine that would force an increase in tar ratings for B&W's Barclay, but leave the rankings unchanged for other ultralow brands.

Their proposed changes have threatened cigaret industry consensus support for the system, however, with B&W and Liggett & Myers protesting any changes. B&W has countered that if changes are needed, FTC should consider dropping its specific numerical tar ratings in favor of "banding" or labeling all brands in a certain tar range as ultralow or low tar.

Before the Barclay case, FTC had never contended that its tar and nicotine ratings—which created the growth of the booming low and ultralow-tar cigaret categories—represented the actual amounts a consumer smoking a particular brand would receive, FTC general counsel Jack Carley said.

But the FTC had contended the ratings provided comparisons that were nonetheless valuable to consumers seeking a lower-tar brand.

The nicotine research critical of the FTC testing system was gathered by a team from the San Francisco General Hospital Medical Center and other California institutions that studied 15 brands of popular cigarets smoked by 272 people about to begin stop-smoking treatment classes. It was funded by the National Institute on Drug Abuse.

Unlike nicotine, which can be traced through blood analysis, the tar delivered by cigarets cannot be measured in the body.

Low-nicotine cigarets may deliver lower tar levels than high-nicotine cigarets, the San Francisco researchers concluded, but "since the intake of nicotine is not substantially altered by the brand of cigaret, the quantitative benefit [if any] in terms of reduced-tar intake is obviously far less than suggested by cigaret advertisements.

"Advertisements from cigaret manufacturers suggesting that smokers of low-yield cigarets will be exposed to less tar and nicotine are misleading," the researchers argued. "Patients who smoke such cigarets should be so advised."# able to make up their minds as to what they wanted to do."

The last contact between the agency and L&M was a letter dated July 6, 1982, from John L. Franklin, L&M marketing programs manager. The letter indicated that the "illustrated materials" provided by the agency were being returned because a review of the company's established brands prevented L&M from "properly evaluating the idea."

However, the letter did not mention Dallas; it referred instead to the other cigaret brand idea submitted by Messrs. Solow and Durfee at the meeting. The latter idea has since been submitted to another cigaret company for consideration.

Neither Mr. Franklin nor the other two L&M execs who were said to have been present at the meeting—Hal Grant, vp-sales and marketing, and Don Fish, national advertising and promotion director—could be reached for comment.

L&M previously acknowledged that it had manufactured Dallas Super Lights and shipped a small quantity to a New York tobacco distributor at the behest of London Tobacco, which owns the right to the Dallas name in international markets (AA, July 18).

As a step toward registering the brand name in the U.S., London Tobacco is required to provide proof that Dallas cigarets had been sold at retail. London Tobacco, having introduced Dallas in Saudi Arabia several months ago, said it only wished to register the brand in the U.S., not market it in this country through a subsidiary incorporated in Texas as Dallas Tobacco Co. L&M produced the first shipment of Dallas cigarets for distribution in Saudi Arabia.

Marty Solow and Jim Durfee stressed that they are not accusing Liggett & Myers of anything at this moment. Certainly they hope that an explanation is forthcoming from the nation's sixth-largest tobacco company. But before that happens, they said, they want to huddle with their lawyer. Informed that the agency would seek legal advice, an L&M attorney said it would be inappropriate to comment on the matter.#

Fair to execs: Step right up

Cola Co., Miller Brewing, General Electric, GTE, International Business Machines and Trailways.

Sponsors generally will pay from $400,000 to $1 million each, although the rare company that opts to build its own pavilion will pay up to $3 million. In return, their names will appear prominently in the fair pavilions most closely related to their industries. They also will be entitled to bill themselves as the official whatever of the fair—or the Louisiana World Exposition, as the $350 million extravaganza is called.

Some of these corporations will have their own exhibits within the pavilions, although no sales will be permitted.

Organizers expect 11 million visitors to the fair, which will run May through November on an 82-acre site along the Mississippi River in downtown New Orleans.

Theme pavilions will include sports, finance, high technology, energy, aquatic life and aviation. The Space Shuttle Enterprise, on loan from the National Aeronautics & Space Administration, will be the centerpiece of the aviation pavilion. An international pavilion will host exhibits from about 24 countries, including Japan and El Salvador.

Corporations not interested in sponsoring pavilions can become suppliers, as Delta Air Lines has done, or back one of the various entertainment displays, such as the band, fireworks or amphitheater.

Product exclusivity is guaranteed. "We would not have Avis and Hertz or Coke and 7UP or IBM and Xerox. It would be kind of gauche," said Joe Sheehan, vp-account supervisor at McDonald & Little, Atlanta, the fair's primary agency.

"Rivers of the World" is the official fair theme, but the New Orleans setting is much more important for marketing purposes. Consumer advertising will play heavily on the host city's image as "a piece of a foreign country that happens to be in America," Mr. Stack said.

Consumer advertising will break this fall, when a season-pass program will begin in New Orleans followed by the rest of Louisiana. A gradual rollout will wind up with a national campaign peaking in January and February.

Plans for creative themes and media mix are up in the air, pending the study of extensive market research just completed.

Ads in the New York Times and Wall Street Journal last week pitched the fair's benefits to corporations. Ads will continue in those publications, advertising trade books and elsewhere.

New Orleans' unusual qualities and the fair's emphasis on entertainment contribute to the organizers' confidence of their position in the tourism marketplace. There will be an agent for the fair in the five biggest overseas markets: The U.K., Japan, Canada, Mexico and West Germany.

Organizers have made presentations at "all the major travel conventions," according to Mr. Stack, and "a very extensive program for the travel industry" is already in place to take advantage of that industry's long lead times.

Agency representatives at the Grand Hyatt presentation were noncommittal. "It looks like impressive preparation for what should be a nice event," said Tom Smith, account exec at D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius. "I was a little disappointed by their discussion of the possibilities for corporate involvement—they didn't say much." Mr. Smith said he would report on the presentation to his agency's senior management, but knew of no current plans to involve D'Arcy clients.

Because turnout at the show was light (about half of the 125 invitees showed up), Mr. Sheehan and Mr. Stack are planning presentations to individual agencies.#

Shop switch stirs local ire

NEW ORLEANS—When it comes to assigning ad agency responsibility for the 1984 World's Fair, there is trouble down on the bayou.

According to Ed Haslam, account exec at Fitzgerald Advertising, New Orleans, World's Fair chief executive Petr Spurney originally told Fitzgerald it would retain all ad business for the New Orleans event.

In February, Jeffrey Stack arrived as vp-marketing for the fair. Mr. Stack, a former theme park executive who knew the agencies that specialized in such efforts, had other intentions.

In April, he told Fitzgerald, an agency with $9 million in billings, that he was switching the bulk of the account to McDonald & Little, an Atlanta shop billing $46 million.

"We were surprised, although we're not unhappy, since we feel we still have a good working relationship and a viable role to play," said Mr. Haslam, who is working on the fair.

Others in the New Orleans ad community did not take the move so calmly. A great deal of civic pride is involved in the fair, and organizers have taken care to assign as many contracts as possible to local businesses. So when Mr. Stack made a local agency play second fiddle to an Atlanta shop, the Advertising Club of New Orleans issued a strong protest in an open letter to fair officials and Louisiana Gov. David Treen. The letter appeared in local publications.

Under the current arrangement, Fitzgerald will handle advertising for participating countries and individual entertainment events. McDonald will be responsible for over-all creative direction and national consumer advertising.

But Mr. Haslam remains optimistic: "Our involvement with the fair is very good for our growth prospects. It will open a lot of doors."#—J.F.

FTC says ad filings light

By STANLEY E. COHEN

WASHINGTON—Federal Trade Commission staffers, poring over public and industry responses to the commission's questionnaire on the broad area of substantiating advertising claims, hope to have recommendations ready by September.

The recommendations will be forwarded to the top level of FTC's bureau of consumer protection, which some time after that will report to the commission members on possible changes in its approach to ad substantiation matters.

One reason staffers think they'll meet a September goal is that the materials that came in by the July 15 deadline in response to the voluntary questionnaire are mostly opinion, and many of these are consistent with prevailing FTC policy (AA, July 18). For example, major advertisers and associations were unanimous in saying FTC should not conduct industrywide substantiation "sweeps," and this practice was abandoned by FTC several years ago. Also, reflecting its awareness of advertising's free-speech rights, FTC already, in practice, follows another of the major recommendations—that, under certain circumstances, advertisers should have greater latitude to support ads with data developed after a claim was made.

By Washington standards, the filings were sparse. Despite the elaborate FTC questionnaire, there were virtually no studies or reports offered of the kind the FTC hoped it would get.

While many of the associations and advertisers agree that chairman James C. Miller III was doing a reasonable thing by calling for a review of a program that has been in place for more than 10 years, the modest number of comments and the restrained rhetoric confirmed the impression that advertisers do not regard the program as burdensome or particularly confusing. There is no evidence of a groundswell of support for anything more than the most modest fine-tuning.

Some networks and major advertisers, supporting a strong FTC substantiation pol-

'Houston Post' put up for sale

By TOM BAYER

Houston's lackluster newspaper market is likely to sparkle with great competitive battles next year after the sale of the 98-year-old Houston Post is completed.

The family-owned morning newspaper is to be sold because of "tax considerations and changing interests" of the owners, according to a surprise announcement last week.

Tax considerations are presumably inheritance tax liabilities that can be anticipated upon the death of the newspaper's chairman and editor, 78-year-old Oveta Culp Hobby, who actively manages the Post's day-to-day affairs. She took over the company in 1964 when her husband died.

Sale of the Houston Post will leave the parent company, H&C Communications, Inc., with its broadcast properties: KPRC-TV, Houston; KVOA-TV, Tucson; WTOK-TV, Meridian, Miss.; WTVF-TV, Nashville, and KPRC (am, fm), Houston.

Newspaper analysts listed A.H. Belo Corp., Gannett Co., Times Mirror Co., Washington Post Co., Knight-Ridder Newspapers and Newhouse Newspapers as likely prospects to consider the acquisition, but none of the media companies stepped forward with a public declaration of interest.

John Morton, Washington-based newspaper analyst with Lynch, Jones & Ryan, was quoted as speculating the Post would command a price between $175 million and $225 million, making it the nation's most expensive newspaper sale. He estimated Post revenues at $160 million in 1982. ADVERTISING AGE lists H&C Communications as the nation's 44th-largest media company, with revenues estimated at $210.8 million.

Marketer gets head start in aspartame awareness

NutraSweet ads boost Lipton

By SCOTT HUME

Thomas J. Lipton Inc.'s promotion of NutraSweet in its iced tea mix may be giving it a head start in tapping consumer interest in aspartame, comparable to Seven-Up Co.'s early lead in marketing no-caffeine soft drinks.

According to adWatch, a monthly survey of advertising awareness, Lipton's June ads scored the largest gain in consumer awareness of all ads surveyed.

Lipton's awareness increased 4.5 percentage points to 13% of all responses from persons asked to name the coffee or tea advertising that first came to mind.

Lipton on May 30 broke network tv spots for the iced tea mix featuring longtime company spokeswoman, tennis star Chris Evert Lloyd. In those spots, from SSC&B, New York, Ms. Lloyd says Lipton's mix has "No sugar. No saccharin. It's got NutraSweet. NutraSweet has the natural taste of sugar, but it's not artificial like saccharin."

Dolph von Arx, Lipton's senior vp-marketing, said the high awareness score was reflected in strong June sales for the aspartame-sweetened mix. He said the company expects continuing favorable consumer reception of the sweetener to result in wider usage.

adWatch

"We were fortunate in leading the tea segment in [to the aspartame market], and so far we don't have any competitors on the shelves," he said. "But I'm sure we'll see some competition by next year. Sales have been so good we've had trouble keeping the product on shelves."

Mr. von Arx said a similar pattern of consumer demand has developed for Equal, Searle's tabletop aspartame sweetener, which Lipton distributes.

He added that the cumulative effect of Searle's generic advertising for aspartame and brand support for Equal, coupled with the ad dollars being spent by Lipton, General Foods (for Sugar Free Kool-Aid, Country Time lemonade and Crystal Light), Borden (Sugar Free Wyler's Drink Mix), Quaker Oats (Halfsies cereal) and others in support of individual items sweetened with aspartame, will continue to build awareness and demand.

Cosmetics chase older consumers

By PAT SLOAN

NEW YORK—Revlon Inc. has signed the premier machinator of ABC's "Dynasty," Joan Collins, as advertising spokeswoman for its Scoundrel fragrance (AA, June 13). While her age is not likely to be discussed in the Scoundrel ads from Grey Advertising, Ms. Collins has admitted to being in her 50s.

At cosmetics rival Germaine Monteil, executives are publicly searching for an over-40 noncelebrity, nonprofessional model who will lend her face to a new print campaign for Supplegen Instant Action Firmer skin treatment.

As the baby boomers find their first gray hairs, advertisers, it seems, are finally trusting not just faces over 30 but faces that haven't seen 30 in years to sell their glamor products.

Since June, French actress Catherine Deneuve has been appearing for American Home Products' Whitehall Laboratories in network tv and national print ads for Youth Garde, the new moisturizer for America's aging masses that is taking aim at Richardson-Vicks' Oil of Olay (AA, June 27).

In her first advertising work in this country since she parted with Chanel more than four years ago, Ms. Deneuve talks about something she usually avoids. Looking squarely into the camera, she reveals that

June was the highest share of consumer responses it has posted since adWatch was inaugurated in April, 1982, it was not enough to move the company up from the third-place position it had held in May.

Folger's, which had been the most-often-mentioned advertiser in the category every month since September, suffered a decline of 4.9 percentage points in June to a 15.6% share of the responses and fell to the second spot.

Maxwell House took first place with a gain of 1.7 percentage points to 17.6% of total mentions. Under adWatch methodology, a change of 2.8 points is considered statistically significant, attributable to more than variations in the sample itself.

Although 7UP's original "no-caffeine" campaign may have significantly increased the brand's awareness among consumers, the "no additives" extension of that campaign, launched the second week of June, has not provided a comparable awareness boost.

Despite heavy backing, 7UP's share of total mentions last month rose only 1 point to 7.7%. Coca-Cola remained on top, dipping slightly to 25.3%, and Pepsi-Cola held on at No. 2, closing the gap slightly with a 1.5 point rise to 22.3%.

AdWatch is a joint project of Advertising Age and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a national random sample of consumers to identify the advertising that first comes to mind of all they have seen or heard in the previous 30 days for a number of product categories.

The survey has been conducted monthly for 15 months. Last month, 1,250 persons were questioned by telephone from June 1 through June 21.

Also of note last month was the first appearance of Sterling Drug's Panadol nonaspirin pain reliever among the top five advertisers mentioned in the medicine & drugs category.

A $15 million campaign introducing the product in the U.S. broke April 18. Panadol's 2.7% share of all responses in the category was enough for it to dislodge Bufferin as No. 5 in awareness.

Ad budgets for other pain relievers, including Sterling's Bayer and Maximum Bayer lines, have been increased, and the top four advertisers in the category retained the spots they held in May.

Although posting a 3.9 point decline from May to June, Tylenol continues to dominate in awareness with a 30% share. Anacin held its No. 2 spot with a 1 point rise to 6.3%, and No. 3 Bayer (5%) and No. 4 Excedrin (3.9%) posted gains of less than a point each.

Also making its first appearance in the June survey was Commodore in the home electronics category. Commodore was mentioned by 2.2% of those responding, good enough for the No. 5 spot, even though it broke no new advertising during the month. Mattel's heavily promoted offer of a color tv for $99 with the purchase of its Aquarius home computer did not seem to register with the adWatch survey respondents.

Atari, No. 1 since the survey began, continued in that position in June with 15.6% of total advertiser mentions in the category. Apple and Texas Instruments continued as No. 2 and No. 3 in mentions, respectively, for the fourth consecutive month.

In other categories last month:

- "The Force" did not appear to be with Burger King last month. Despite heavy promotion for its "Return of the Jedi" glassware premium, Burger King failed to close the gap with consistent front-runner McDonald's in the fast-food category. While Burger King rose 1.7 points to 18% of total mentions last month, McDonald's awareness was up 2.3 points to 44.6%.
- Avon's 3.5 point rise to 7.5% put it atop the cosmetics & fragrances category for the first time since March, unseating Charlie, which fell from 4.6% in May to 2.4% and No. 6 last month. Maybelline's 1.2 point jump to 5.1% in June moved it to No. 2 in the closely contested category. Revlon held on to No. 3 with 3.6%.#

Red ink perils 'Progressive'

Madison, Wis.—Progressive is in danger of folding, after 74 years of publication, unless it can pay its debts. Failure to raise money by Labor Day would mean "it would be extremely difficult to keep going," said Erwin Knoll, editor of the leftist monthly. "I hate to even think about it."

While its circulation of 50,000 "has never been higher," said Mr. Knoll, steadily rising costs, coupled with reader contributions falling off "rather severely," have resulted in $150,000 worth of red ink.

The magazine is doing "everything we can think of" to raise funds, he said, including mailings and calls to regular contributors. "While the number of contributors has remained steady," he said, "or increased a little, the size of the average contribution has declined."

Progressive depends to a large degree on contributions because of its relative paucity of ad revenues: $13,000 last year, out of a total operating income of about $730,000. Ads are mostly for books and classified listings.#

AA Workshop hears calls for creative breakthrough

New York—American advertising is heading toward more "realness" despite a deplorable scarcity of commercials that show the "real America" as it is today, predicted John Bergin, vice-chairman of McCann-Erickson Worldwide.

In a speech at the 26th Advertising Age Creative Workshop here Aug. 10, Mr. Bergin urged his audience to explore new ways to create excitement on a magazine page or a tv screen.

He backed this call with the observation that, in his 33 years in the business, he has seen every well-accepted creative rule successfully broken.

For more coverage of the Advertising Age Creative Workshop held in New York last week see Pages 3, 76, 77 and 78.

In dissecting the state of creativity today, Mr. Bergin was not alone. A number of other agency leaders and advertising executives gave the nearly 800 workshop attendees their views on today's advertising. These included Martin Puris, president of Ammirati & Puris, who urged ad agencies to set up a formal training program for copywriters.

Attendance at the 3½-day conclave in the New York Hilton included 250 advertising professionals from 41 countries. The U.S. contingent represented advertising agencies, media and advertisers from 44 states.

Mr. Bergin, who heads the worldwide Coca-Cola account at McCann, said there is a chance in every product category to break a pattern, to split from the pack or be

Ads' Olympic role hailed by Reagan

New York—President Reagan, in a special greeting to Advertising Age Creative Workshop attendees here last week, praised the advertising industry's support of the 1984 Olympics.

In his telegram, to Robert Brandon, director-promotional products group, Anheuser-Busch, whose presentation dealt with Olympic tie-in opportunities, Mr. Reagan said: "I appreciate the opportunity to send greetings to those attending the 1983 Advertising Age Creative Workshop discussion tonight on the 1984 Olympic Games.

"As you know, the spirit of private sector initiatives lies close to the heart of my administration. The advertising industry's support for the Olympics over the years serves as an excellent example of what can be accomplished without government involvement. I congratulate you on taking the leadership in this effort.

"To achieve what you have in the name of the Olympics requires a

Julius Wile puts Waring, Sacks on notice

Lake Success, N.Y.—Julius Wile Sons & Co., a division of London-based Whitbread Ltd., is reviewing agencies for its Julius Wile and Fleischmann Distilling divisions after putting Waring & LaRosa and Sacks & Rosen, respectively, on 90-days' notice. The W&L brands, spending about $3 million, include Dry Sack sherry, B&B and Benedictine liqueurs. The Fleischmann brands at Sacks & Rosen, also a multi-million-dollar account, include Fleischmann gin and vodka, Garnier cordials, Canadian Ltd. and several cream liqueurs. The decision to leave the shops stems from a management change, a source said.

Playboy to dismiss 30 in 'consolidation'

Chicago—Playboy Enterprises will dismiss 30 employes over the next four months in an ongoing effort designed to "streamline and consolidate operations," according to a company spokesman. About half of those being terminated are researchers, writers and editorial support people within the publishing division (Playboy and Games). Two New York-based pr staffers have been dismissed; the other cuts have been made within administrative support positions. Responsibility for all these jobs will be absorbed by current staffers, Playboy said.

P&G tests new Tender Leaf bag in Cleveland

Cincinnati—Procter & Gamble has introduced a restaged Tender Leaf tea package into a Cleveland test. The redesigned tea bag—it has changed from single to double chamber—is supported by tv spots by Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York, that focus on a father and son, and carry the message, "It's the tender leaves in the Tender Leaf that makes Tender Leaf tender. . .For a tender taste that's consistently smooth and not bitter." Last September, P&G acquired Tender Leaf, with sales estimated at

U.S. probing Tanner taxes

By STUART EMMRICH and JOHN J. O'CONNOR

Another round of shockwaves went through the advertising community late last week when federal agents swooped down on the Memphis offices of William B. Tanner Co., the well-known barter and media services company, to investigate possible charges of income tax fraud, mail fraud conspiracy and payoffs to employes of Tanner clients.

Although no charges have been filed, the agents reportedly are investigating what may be payoffs of Tanner clients and illegal funneling of company funds for private use of company chairman William Tanner.

Just two weeks ago, John Ernst, chairman of Advertising to Women, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy and income tax evasion (AA, Aug. 8). Mr. Ernst was accused of using the assets of ATW to pay for a substantial amount of his and his employes' personal expenses. (For industry reaction to that case, see earlier story on Page 75.)

Fall ad plans reflect healthier company

Chrysler to play up brands

By RALPH GRAY

HIGHLAND PARK, MICH.—Chrysler, the third world of auto companies, will try again to play up its brand names in 1984 introductory advertising.

For several years, its precarious financial position forced it to abort separation of the Chrysler-Plymouth and Dodge nameplates in favor of still-in-business ads and rebates.

Things are better now, and Chrysler plans a significant presence under brand umbrella campaigns, Joseph Campana, vp-marketing, said at a press conference.

Chrysler-Plymouth wants to broaden its appeal on the Plymouth marque to younger buyers. "We've been pretty fact-oriented, and we want to stay selling facts but we want some emotional appeal," Arthur Liebler, general marketing manager, said.

The fall effort for Dodge "isn't an advertising campaign but a full marketing strategy. We want to create an identity for Dodge," said Joseph Caddell, general marketing manager. "A lot of things are factual and easy to understand—and dull," he said. "We want excitement and pizazz."

Dodge products will have a common theme: "We are Dodge. An American revolution."

Chairman Lee Iacocca will kick things off Sept. 9 with 64 network spots about America regaining the lead in technology.

"You don't just need a lot up here," he says, pointing to his head. "You need a little something in here," he adds, pointing to his midsection. It's his 20th spot for Chrysler via Kenyon & Eckhardt, Birmingham, Mich.

Plymouth, once one of the big low-price three with Chevrolet and Ford, has sunk to one-third of its heyday. Sales this year are about 300,000, compared with 1 million 10 years ago.

"Our objective is to stress the Plymouth name. We'll say Plymouth Horizon, instead of Horizon. We'll position Plymouth for the first-time buyer," Mr. Liebler said.

Chrysler's five-year, 50,000-mile warranty will be linked with the Plymouth name in spots like: "The 5/50 Plymouth Reliant K, the highest mileage six-passenger car in America. Match it." The "Match it" line extends to Turismo and Horizon. Competition like the Ford Mustang, the Chevrolet Camaro and Cavalier and the Toyota Corolla are named.

Dodge puts its strategy in a 60-second commercial from BBDO, Southfield, Mich., that says in part: "Revolution in the streets. An automotive revolution. . .because Dodge has a vision, a front-wheel-drive, fuel-efficient, fun-to-drive vision of what's been missing from the American road. . .the largest turbocharged fleet in the world, the largest front-wheel-drive fleet in the world. A revolution. An American revolution."

Both divisions are counting a lot on the same car, the code-named G24 sporty car that goes up against Ford Mustang and Chevrolet Camaro. Since the cars are virtually identical, marketing had to unmatch the vehicles.

Chrysler-Plymouth goes upscale with leather seats and electronic instruments and a comparison with the Porsche 944. "We know the competition was good," runs one spot. "We had to be better. The new Chrysler Laser challenges the gold standard Porsche 944."

Copy says tests showed the Laser outdoing the 944 in braking and handling, and that it

Seoul Olympics looking beyond network tv rights

By CRAIG REISS

NEW YORK—The U.S. broadcast rights for the 1988 Summer Olympic Games in Seoul, South Korea, are expected to include rights covering all program distribution technologies, and not to be limited to network tv broadcasts.

Discussions between the three U.S. tv networks, other potential Olympics rights bidders and the Seoul Olympic Committee have included talks on distributing the 1988 Summer Olympics coverage through a combination of network tv, cable, pay cable, pay per view and other delivery forms. While all talks so far have been preliminary and the Seoul committee has not established any guidelines for bidding on the rights, sources close to the talks say it is clear that the Koreans will require bids covering the entire spectrum of new technological distribution and not just network tv coverage.

As a result, all parties concede, the 1988 Summer Olympics network tv package will be weaker than in 1984. To facilitate pay per view or other new-technology distribution, some of the most popular Olympic events will have to be dropped from the network tv package. None of the potential bidders has calculated which events could be sacrificed from the network tv package, but some observers say the most likely candidates are the heavyweight boxing finals, the mile and other track events and the decathlon competition.

Furthermore, the expected inev-

B&W's Richland offers 25 per pack

By JOHN J. O'CONNOR

Brown & Williamson Tobacco's new Richland, the second brand in the infant 25-cigarets-per-pack market, might speed changes in tax laws in 17 states that currently nullify the new pack's five-cigaret bonus.

Until last week's announcement that Richland will be available at retail by the second week of October in eight midwestern and southern states, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco was waging a solitary battle to have those 17 states tax cigarets by the unit and not by punitive multiples of 10 and 20. Reynolds' Century brand also offers 25 cigarets per package.

NH&S to do more for Atari

By BOB MARICH

Needham, Harper & Steers/USA, a minor agency relegated to "special projects" in Atari's stable, is on the road to major agency status.

NH&S is carving out a niche in Atari's videogame software advertising, once ruled exclusively by Doyle Dane Bernbach. The agency also picked up the assignment for Atarisoft, a trade name for a new division marketing computer and game software that is compatible for equipment made by Atari competitors. Atarisoft ads will break this fall.

The clearest sign that NH&S is on the rise came with its "Nobody's hotter than Atari this summer" campaign and giveaway promotion (AA, July 4). It originally was to be strictly radio but was expanded to tv. A special spot the agency produced specifically for MTV: Music Television cable network was shortened and aired on commercial tv.

"It's the third time where we made ads for MTV that had such a good response that we've gone broader with them," said Theodore Voss, senior vp-marketing, Atari products management division. The surrealistic ad features teen-

Ad-to-sales ratios listed by industry

EVANSTON, ILL.—Management consultants Schonfeld & Associates has issued its annual report on advertising as a percentage of sales.

The study, which also forecasts 1984 ad spending of 4,400 individual companies and 240 industries via use of computer models, shows ratios of ad spending to net sales and to gross margin (sales minus cost of goods sold) for 1982, 1983 and 1984. The accompanying table from the study contains average 1982 ratios by industry. However, Eugene P. Schonfeld, chairman of Schonfeld & Associates, cautioned that within many industry sectors, individual companies may spend significantly more or less than the average.

The raw data for the study were compiled from more than 5,000 10-K Reports filed by publicly owned companies with the Securities & Exchange Commission. Therefore, advertising expenditures include media spending and such nonmedia spending as collateral literature and production. For this reason, these figures are often substantially larger than figures from media auditing services such as Leading National Advertisers.

"In some categories, there may be substantial nonmedia advertising, such as catalog advertising by retailers, point-of-purchase advertising in alcoholic beverages and direct mail in financial services. By subtracting media spending estimates, it is interesting to see how much nonmedia spending there is," Mr. Schonfeld commented.

While data for the study were compiled from published financial statements rather than surveys, cautious interpretation is required for several reasons. First, companies may vary in what they include under advertising expenditures. Second, many large companies are in several fields, yet are listed in only their primary industry sector. Distortion may result because a large subsidiary may not be included in the industry in which it competes. Third, a few large companies are privately held and their figures are not included.

In the section of the Schonfeld study that includes the 1984 ad spending forecast, Procter & Gamble is predicted to hold its role as the top ad spender in 1984 with $980.1 million, slightly ahead of General Motors at $950.4 million.

Depending upon media price inflation, either or both could top the $1 billion mark.

In 1984, the drug industry will lead all industries in ad spending with $4.1 billion, Schonfeld predicted. Retail department stores will take a distant second place with $3.3 billion, followed by food companies at $3.0 billion.

Major new industries will emerge as large ad spenders in the next few years—computer software and computer hardware servicing. Companies in these industries are still small, but their ad growth rates are among the fastest in American industry, the Schonfeld company reported. It said the computer-related services segment has an ad growth rate of 37.6% compounded annually.

Other high advertising growth industries cited include: Telecommunications at 24%, fueled by technological change and the split of AT&T; solar energy equipment at 23%; air transport at 14.6%; personal credit and financial services at 22.5%.

Foreign companies will remain a competitive factor in many markets. Matsushita Electric is predicted to spend $438.2 million on advertising in 1984, considerably more than most U.S. companies. Spending at Honda is expected to be $273.1 million, up 11%, and Hitachi is estimated to hit $209.4 million.

The study, AD$ FORECASTS, contains 1984 ad expenditures, advertising-to-sales and advertising-to-gross profits for companies in 245 industries.

Besides ratios, the full study contains 1983 and 1984 ad expenditure growth rates, a measure of ad spending stability and a rating of ad effectiveness for each company and industry.

A copy of the 155-page study is available for $275 from Schonfeld & Associates, 2550 Crawford Ave., Evanston, Ill. 60201.#

Special Report

Liquor Marketing

Dave Jordano

Blending recipes for survival

By Lori Kesler

Some folks in the liquor industry must feel a lot like the guy who oversleeps on the day of an important appointment, then wakes with a chilling jolt, knowing he'll have to run like crazy to make up for lost time.

Liquor marketers, indeed, are hustling these days because they just woke up and took a long hard look at their industry. And what they found was not a pretty sight.

Lori Kesler is an Advertising Age correspondent in St. Louis, and a frequent contributor to Magazine.

After several years of relatively flat sales, liquor shipments in 1982 plunged 4.5%, back to pre-1975 levels, according to Impact, the wine and spirits newsletter.

There's some good news, of course. Rum's still a rising star, with Bacardi, the largest-selling brand in the country, leading the hit parade.

Cordials and liqueurs—especially the creams—flourished last year as the liquor industry looked hungrily to that market for any excitement it could muster. And some classic leading brands managed to thrive in stunted categories by grabbing shares from their ailing competitors.

But those bright spots just weren't enough to make up for the declines all major liquor categories recorded in 1982. The whisky category—bourbon, blends, Canadians and scotch—suffered the most dramatic drop, though some experts believe bourbon already has hit bottom and could recover ground in 1983.

And white goods—vodka, gin, rum and tequila—as a category lost gallonage last year for the first time ever. Apparently, the white goods' soaring fortunes of the 1970s have come to a screeching halt, with gin and domestic vodka the biggest losers.

"The year 1982 was probably the most difficult one distillers will ever have to face," says Marvin Shanken, editor and publisher of Impact. "A number of negative forces seemed to come together to hit them all at once between January and December."

Experts agree that the economy in 1982 hurt distilled spirits sales. Wine and beer felt the pressure, too, giving lie to the old theory that alcoholic beverages could float comfortably through any recession.

But liquor marketers can't blame all their woes on economic hard times. Several other factors also come into play.

For example, changing life styles have taken their toll. Many American consumers, swept up in the hoopla of the health and fitness movement, have switched to lighter-tasting, lower-alcohol beverages.

And the current generation of young people, weaned on soft drinks, seems more inclined to move up to beer and wine than to the hard stuff. As one liquor executive notes glumly, "Today's young people are video watchers, and tv advertising targeted to that group has given beer and wine a big advantage."

Then, too, there's the move to moderation. Although liquor marketers support the concept of moderate drinking, some claim the current crop of what they call "neo-Prohibitionists" employ scare tactics, and they say they're being hurt by the anti-alcohol crusaders.

In addition, distillers are worrying about threats of heavier taxes on liquor. Local, state and federal taxes already add several dollars to the price of a bottle of whisky, and a proposed increase could increase the ante about 50%.

Another factor that may be dampening the national appetite for spirits is the graying of America.

Sam Haas, former liquor retailer and president of Worldwide Promotion Co., Chicago, notes that more than 20% of the population is past 60, "and that's a very sterile market for liquor."

And finally, experts say, the distilled spirits people must blame themselves for some of their problems because they've been noticeably slow to adapt to certain changing trends.

Says Impact's Mr. Shanken: "The liquor industry's been in trouble for five years. It's nothing new. But now, I think, distillers are finally beginning to respond to the changing times."

He says he's glad to see companies pumping new blood into the industry with such innovative products as Seagram's Captain Morgan spiced rum. He's encouraged, too, by dramatic new advertising thrusts for cognac, brandy and imported vodka.

Indeed, over-all liquor brand advertising increased in 1982 despite sales declines. The top companies spent some $282.3 million in advertising last year, about $6 million more than in 1981, Impact reports.

Still, Mr. Shanken thinks liquor marketers have a long way to go. "There's a crying need for them to be more aggressive, creative and prolific," he says. "It's time to start rolling out more new products. The ones coming out now are exciting, but they're simply not enough."

Of course, in the liquor industry, everything must be channeled through the legally sanctioned distribution systems, and that makes local retailer and distributor support vital to a new product introduction.

But sometimes retailers and distributors resist taking on new brands, and their intransigence angers Mr. Shanken.

"Shame on them," he says. "If they want to be dinosaurs, then let them go into another line of business. In liquor, they're going to have to take risks and give new products a chance if the industry is to grow and prosper."

David Kay, president of St. Louis' 905 International, a liquor store chain, welcomes new products gladly. "No problem," he says. "We make room by cutting a slow-selling brand off the bottom of the list. We're always looking for new excitement."

However, others in the industry argue that too much of the so-called new product activity is really just copycatting.

"Everybody followed Bailey's into the cream market," says Mr. Haas. "Now the stores stock more brands of creams than bourbons. But [creams'] prices are coming down and eventually most of them are going to die."

"Research and development is very expensive and not many companies can afford it, so some copycatting is inevitable," acknowledges Perry Luntz, editor and publisher of Beverage Alcohol Market Report, New York. He adds, however, "if a distiller spends a lot of money creating a new product, he ought to take the trouble to make it something really different, not something that just complicates a line."

Victor Zast, advertising and marketing vp at James B. Beam Distilling Co., Chicago, agrees that me-too products cause confusion. "One knock-off after another doesn't help the industry," he says.

But he's quick to add that genuinely new concepts can breathe vitality into the marketplace and give the consumer a variety of choices. In fact, he says it's time for distillers to forget the standard gospel that says a good product will live on forever.

A case in point may be a new Beam product to be introduced later this year. Apparently, the old bourbon company's young offspring will be unabashedly trendy. "It will describe the way people live today. I'm not sure it'll fit the way people live 20 years from now," Mr. Zast says.

But that's not important. What's important to distillers right now is divining the tastes of the 1980s. And it seems most companies are betting on sweeter-tasting, lower-proof drinks.

"The consumer today goes for more flavor and less bang," says Mr. Luntz.

That, in itself, may represent a significant attitude change. "Thirty years ago, people consumed alcohol essentially to put themselves in another state of mind. To do it, they had to learn to drink products that didn't taste good to them," says W.V. Elliott, chairman at W.V. Elliott Co., a spirits company in New Britain, Conn.

He believes the American consumer is finished with all that. "In the past, people didn't care if they were fat or sloppy. Now we have a health-conscious society," Mr. Elliott says. "And people today are sophisticated enough to know that alcohol consumed moderately can be a very good adjunct to anyone's life style. But if misused, it can hurt people. So they're cutting back, using alcohol more judiciously."

When Mr. Elliott's company introduces a 48-proof liqueur in September, the label will carry the message, "Enjoy in moderation." Eventually, labels on all Elliott products will carry that statement.

All ads for Elliott products also carry those three words. "I feel strongly about moderation," he says. "Pointing out both the good and bad sides of alcohol isn't going to hurt us at all."

Mr. Elliott, whose three-year-old company has created such products as Rumple Minze peppermint schnapps, Schnapple apple liqueur and Melano Cappucino, finds plenty of evidence that Americans "talk dry but drink sweet."

"Kids in this country grow up with Coca-Cola and ice cream. We don't know what dry is," he says.

Many new products also have relatively low alcohol content—for a couple of reasons. Mr. Luntz says if the federal excise tax goes up—it's based on alcohol content—distillers may have to concentrate on lower-proof spirits to keep prices in line.

But distillers say they're simply bowing to consumer tastes for "lighter" alcohol drinks. Women especially are said to prefer lower-proof drinks, and females have become increasingly important to the market.

Heublein Spirits Group, Hartford, Conn., noting consumer interest in lower-proof drinks, is reformulating its premixed Club cocktails to contain less alcohol.

Heublein also has several new low-proof products in development. One may target the working woman who wants to drink at lunch, but also wants to keep a clear head, says a spokeswoman.

While new products may be a good vehicle for the industry, Mr. Kay of 905 International argues that liquor marketers should focus more attention on finding more imaginative ways to present the old standbys. He applauds Jack Daniels' current on-premise promotion featuring a mixed drink called Lynchburg lemonade.

"It's great because it's not selling whisky per se," notes Mr. Kay. "It suggests a use for the product that appeals to certain groups—young people and women, for example—who don't normally drink Jack Daniels. "There's not enough of that kind of imaginative salesmanship in liquor marketing," he says.

"What are the distillers offering? Contests, free gifts, items to buy. That's not interesting," grumbles Sam Haas. "They should give people a reason to drink the product."And, he adds, "Distillers aren't helping retailers enough. I don't think they're supporting their product in proper fashion. If we don't do it on our own, forget it."

Oddly, distillers have been known to level the same criticism against retailers. Howard S. Feldman, president at Schenley Industries, New York, last fall told a gathering of package store retailers that they've concentrated on wine and beer while giving short shrift to spirits.

Such comments from both sides reflect the importance of marketing at the local level. But, says editor Mr. Luntz, some liquor marketing executives who come directly from package goods industries "just can't comprehend that this is a 50-market industry.

"You can't sell liquor in New York the way you sell it in California, Florida or Michigan," he says, "because every state has a different set of restrictions. And, too, tastes differ from region to region."

Mr. Luntz' advice to liquor marketers "would be to cut back national advertising and hire more guys to beat the bushes. But then I'm an old-timer."

Meanwhile, critics of the liquor industry, who've recently grown more vocal, often accuse marketers of encouraging alcohol abuse by promoting their product to heavy users. But insiders insist that quite the opposite is true.

"What other industry spends millions of dollars telling the public to limit use of its product?" Mr. Luntz asks. "I think the industry should call the public's attention to what it has done to promote moderation."

A distillery executive, who asked not to be identified, says: "We're responsible businessmen. We know people shouldn't abuse our products. We also know statistically people who drink in moderation live longer, have a better sex life and are more sociable. But we can't come out and say those things. Meanwhile, people make a living grandstanding and saying very bad things about alcohol."

Mr. Shanken says most distillers don't support legal changes that would allow them to advertise on radio and tv because they fear such a move would bring even more charges of irresponsible promotion of alcohol use.

"I respect their point of view," Mr. Shanken says, "but I'd like to see liquor advertising on tv. I just don't believe our industry is a second-class citizen."

Seagram takes crown for ad awareness

Despite an advertising spending cutback in 1982 of about 8% from 1981, Jos. E. Seagram & Sons still led the distilled spirits industry in ad outlays by a commanding margin, putting an estimated $86 million-plus behind its various brands.

According to Impact, a wine and spirits newsletter, Seagram poured nearly $60 million of that into magazines, and the company's Seagram's V.O., Crown Royal and Seagram's 7 Crown ranked among the top 10 spenders in that medium, taking the No. 1, No. 3 and No. 9 spots.

A separate study of liquor advertising awareness found that it was Seagram advertising that ranked highest in consumer awareness last year.

The monthly survey, conducted by SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb., asked consumers, "Of all the advertising for liquor and liquor products you've read, seen, or heard in the past month, which advertising first comes to mind?"

In all, 11,280 consumers 18 or older were asked that question by telephone last year.

Of those who recalled liquor advertising, 19% named "Seagram" advertising (without specifying a brand). The second- and third-most named ads were for specific brands: Jack Daniel's, mentioned by 11% of all those who remembered an ad, and Black Velvet, mentioned by 10%.

Impact puts Jack Daniel's 1982 ad spending at slightly more than $5 million, and Black Velvet's just at the $5 million mark. Of the top three in 1982 ad awareness, Jack Daniel's was the sole sales gainer, increasing its sales by about 4%, to nearly 4 million cases, industry sources estimate.

In a follow-up SRI survey commissioned by ADVERTISING AGE and conducted in June of this year, Seagram, Jack Daniel's and Black Velvet again held the top three spots in ad awareness, with Jack Daniel's switching into the No. 1 slot for June. The June survey covered a national random sample of 1,250 adults.

This one-month survey also delved into the demographics of the respondents and found that the top three were remembered more by males. Fifty-six per cent of those recalling Seagram were male while nearly two-thirds of those naming Jack Daniel's and Black Velvet ads were men.

The brands parted company when it came to ad awareness by age group, however. Jack Daniel's and Black Velvet had the highest ad recall among 18-to-34-year-olds, while more people 45 to 54 recalled Seagram ads than any other age segment.

Advertising for Smirnoff vodka and Seagram's 7 Crown was recalled by females more than any other brands, the June survey found.

Smirnoff advertising ranked No. 5 in awareness among all consumers in 1982 and No. 4 last June. In 1982, ad spending for Smirnoff vodka was increased more than 30% to slightly less than $10 million, about half what the entire category spent on 1982 ads, according to Impact figures.

Two outstanding successes last year, Bacardi rum, the top seller in the entire distilled spirits market, and Bailey's Irish Cream, the brand that launched and still dominates the cream liqueur category, ranked No. 7 and No. 10, respectively, in top-of-mind ad awareness for 1982. Bailey's poured nearly $7 million into advertising last year, while more than $8.5 million was put behind Bacardi rum.

The brand that ranked No. 6 in ad awareness for 1982 in the SRI study was not a distilled spirit, but Harvey's Bristol Cream, a sherry that, like other wine products, is allowed to advertise on tv.

In a separate question for the June SRI survey, respondents were asked if they consume any of a list of distilled spirits. Vodka was the winner for that question; 31% of the 1,250 people in the sample said they did consume some vodka.

(About 43% of Hispanics surveyed answered that they did drink some vodka; only 16% of the blacks did.)

Rum was No. 2 in the total sample, with a 25% score; gin and bourbon tied for third with 23% and scotch followed with a 20% "consumption incidence."

In an age group breakdown, it was the 18-to-24-year-olds that said most often that they consumed some rum (36%). Bourbon came in first with the over 65-year-olds, receiving 22% of the mentions of that group.

The same group was asked which of those liquor types they consumed most. (This reflects personal consumption habits only and does not indicate total volume for the various types of liquor.)

In this question, bourbon moved up to join vodka with a tie at 22%. Scotch followed with 12.5%; rum was close behind at 11.7%, and gin followed at 10.3%. Liqueurs and cordials were next with 8.6%, and brandy and cognac trailed behind with 7.5%.

The preferences become clearer in looking at demographic breakdowns. Of the people that said vodka was the spirit they consume the most, 67% were female and 92% were white.

Bourbon showed up as the preferred drink of white males; 96% of those naming bourbon as the liquor they drink most were white and 66% were men. Bourbon was named as liquor drunk most by 21% of those 45 to 54, a percentage higher than would be expected in the survey.

Scotch, the survey indicates, also finds its biggest following among men. Of those who called scotch the spirit they turned to most often, 68% were male. Whisky with a Scottish ancestry also proved to be the first choice of more people in the Northeast census area (28%) and among those with incomes of more than $20,000 (35% above $20,000 and 33% above $40,000).

What most satisfies the female palate? Liqueurs and cordials got the nod here. Women accounted for about two-thirds of those who said liqueurs were what they drank most.

That category also was picked as the drink most preferred by 25% of people 35-to-44-years-old, by 27% with incomes exceeding $40,000 and by 48% of respondents residing in the Northeast.

Women also were the leaders in picking rum as first choice in liquor (63%). That distilled spirit, currently enjoying growth in a generally depressed liquor market, also was chosen as the favorite among 18-to-34-year-olds, with a respectable 58%.

Gin, too, was most often named as the liquor drunk most by that age group, with 51% of those under 34 years old naming the product.

The black population favors brandy and cognac, according to the SRI survey; this finding backs up a national trend that has spurred cognac marketers to put substantial money behind ads aimed at blacks. Close to one-third of the blacks surveyed identified brandy or cognac as the liquor they drank most. About 41% of those naming cognac or brandy as the alcoholic beverage they drink most had incomes of between $20,000 and $40,000.

Over-all, the survey shows that as income increases, the consumption incidence for all liquor products increases. This could be a clue to the generally better performance for premium brands in all liquor categories.

The maximum error range in the June survey is plus or minus 2.8 percentage points at the 95% confidence level.

Barkeeps

years has been the bartender at a nearby West Side hot spot, Nanny Rose, was on hand.

Not surprisingly, the clientele at both Nanny Rose and CW's leans toward white wine and somewhat esoteric drinks. Daiquiris are big in the summer, along with drinks like the Cape Cod (vodka, cranberry juice and orange juice), Melon Balls (Midori liqueur, vodka and a splash of orange juice) and the Alabama Slammer (Jack Daniel's, Southern Comfort, vodka and a splash of o.j.). "That last one will really do you in," says Herbie. "You get the Fire Island and Hamptons crowd, who are used to ordering things like the Cape Cod on the weekends, so they want them here, too."

Females, Herbie and Frank find, are fond of white wine spritzers and kir—most recently, kir royale. "The more hard-core women drink gin and tonics or vodka," he says. "Martinis, Manhattans and so forth are more associated with the business crowd, the older guys.

According to Herbie, customers have persistent interest in new, tasty liqueurs—most recently, a hazelnut liqueur called Frangelico and the melon liqueur Midori.

Just as liqueurs carry a chic panache, "people order by brand when they want to impress," Herbie says. "It's the same type fashion concern that made coffee drinks and Kahlua so popular during the late 1970s."

Wine imports up, domestics drop, 1982 data show

By JOHN C. MAXWELL JR. and MARY B. ENGLISH

The wine market saw an overall sales increase of 1% in 1982. Imports continued to gain share, increasing 6.4% from 1981, while the domestic category registered a drop of 0.4% in total shipments.

Although imports have been the cause of domestic market share erosion for some time, this was the first time in several years that unit shipments were down.

There is a continuing movement toward white wine and away from reds and rosés. We believe this trend has resulted from several factors: The U.S. populace is moving away from red wine, which is generally heavier and served at room temperature, and is drinking more white wine, which is usually served chilled. White is also easier for first-time wine drinkers to get used to, and it is more frequently used in place of a cocktail than red.

Although this trend has been evident for several years now, it is slowing down and we expect it to level off over the next few years as Americans become more sophisticated wine drinkers and begin to test other waters.

White wine also has gained popularity in foreign markets. This is evidenced by the introduction of an addition to Paul Masson's existing line in the U.K. The new product is a dry white wine designed to appeal to the more sophisticated palates of red wine consumers. Masson believes this may boost its U.K. sales as much as 10%.

Imports

Imports continued to eat away at domestic market share. At 22.2% in 1982, imports are rapidly approaching the point where they will account for fully one-quarter of all wine sold in the U.S. Italy continued to account for the largest share of the import market, with 57.7% of the total. All countries registered year-to-year gains, with the exception of Portugal, which showed a 6.7% decline. France showed the largest increase (16%). We believe this jump resulted in part from the continued weakness of the French franc. Over-all, the import market rose 6.4% over 1981.

There are several reasons for the continuing strength of imports. First is the strength of the dollar in Europe, which serves to make imports very price-competitive with domestics. Second, many governments subsidize their wine industries. Third, as many European nations are faced with declining consumption and increasing production in their own countries, they are unloading excesses onto the U.S. market. When economic conditions normalize, this trend should begin to level off and reverse within the next few years.

It should be noted that some have suggested that a good deal of the Italian import category, which accounted for more than half of all imports in 1982, is in the form of lambrusco and Riunite-type wines, which have historically been more appealing to American consumers than many other imported wines. If one were to deduct this percentage from total imports, shipment comparisons would not be quite as drastic.

The domestic situation

Of the domestic producers, E.&J. Gallo was again far and away the No. 1 producer, with 24.7% of the U.S. market, up from 23.7% in 1981. United Vintners (now known as Heublein Wines) was second, with an 8.7% share, down half a share point from 1981, and Wine Spectrum, up almost a full-share point, surpassed Almaden this year, taking over third place. Almaden now ranks fourth. Of the top three, Gallo and Wine Spectrum showed year-to-year sales increases of 5.5% and 16.6%, respectively, while United Vintners/Heublein registered a decline of 4.6% on this same basis.

The combination of the recession and three large bumper crops back to back caused many producers to discount their products in an attempt to (a) diminish surplus stocks and (b) retain some semblance of competition with imports. Normally, this economic strategy would have stimulated consumption. However, this was not the case and, because many people still consider wine a luxury and not a necessity, we believe that the state of the economy and cheap imports have kept, and will continue to keep, domestic sales flat and prices well below normal for the near future. Retail prices are currently approaching the levels of a decade ago.

The winners in this bear wine market appear to be the companies whose marketing strategies and expertise have allowed them to weather the storm. As it is our contention that 15% of the population consumes 85% of the wine, a possible solution to increasingly sluggish domestic consumption might be to take the emphasis off wine as a mysterious, romantic, special-occasion luxury item and make it a more of an "anybody, anywhere, anytime" drink. In many European countries, wine is looked upon more as a food and is consumed daily. We believe that one step in making wine the drink of the American public would be to change the container, making it both more visible and available in a wide variety of shapes, sizes and different types of containers. We would particularly like to see more cans available.

Wine can currently be purchased in supermarkets in California and several other states. If this were to be approved in New York and other key states, it would most definitely be a boon to wine consumption. California currently accounts for about 20% of the total domestic market, while New York accounts for an estimated 10%.

Another smart marketing move might lie in wine producers teaming up as dairy producers have done in the past to create industry-wide advertising rather than battling it out among themselves, vying for increased share in a shrinking domestic market.

The light wine market has, in our opinion, been a bust. Its performance has been flat and is beginning to trend downward. We estimate that the light market now accounts for about 1.5% of the total, whereas original industry expectations were between 10% and 20%. One of the reasons light wines have not lived up to expectations is that wine is already perceived as low-calorie. A second reason may lie in the taste. By removing a percentage of the alcohol content, as well as sugar content, the taste tends to lose something in the process and we believe that a good deal of wine's appeal is based on how good it tastes. Although we do not rule out light wine as eventually finding its market niche, it may be an idea whose time has not yet come.

Exports

U.S. wineries are attempting to further infiltrate the European market, especially in the U.K., which is the leading importer of U.S. wines, followed by Canada and West Germany. Seagram, which pioneered the California wine market in the U.K. with Paul Masson, has recently been joined by E.&J. Galio. Coca-Cola's Wine Spectrum is scheduled to enter the market this summer. Although the industry is currently attempting to have trade barriers against U.S. exports to Europe eliminated or softened with legislation such as "The Wine Equity Act of 1983," we believe that even if this were to pass, it would have no significant impact for the following reasons: (a) Europe is already awash in wine and is also facing decreasing demand; (b) U.S. goods are very costly in Europe, and (c) our penetration is now minuscule and is further hampered by labor regulations in various countries. However, the main problem with U.S. wines in Europe will continue to be the strength of the dollar against foreign currencies.#

Minnetonka splits with Advertising to Women

Chaska, Minn.—Minnetonka Inc. has terminated its one-year relationship with Advertising to Women, New York, citing differences in creative philosophy and disagreements on specific creative execution. Minnetonka president Robert Taylor said the split was unrelated to the tax charges against ATW chairman John Ernst (AA, Aug. 8). ATW exec vp Walter Kloris said the split was mutually agreed upon, and "had been brewing" before the charges became public. Combined ad spending on Softsoap and ShowerMate liquid soaps exceeded $3 million in 1982; ATW was on a creative retainer. ATW also had responsibility for the new Check-Up toothpaste now being introduced. Mr. Taylor said his company will be reevaluating its needs, and that it may go back in-house.

Campbell, others probe dealings with Tanner

New York—At least three large clients of the William B. Tanner Co.—Beneficial Management Corp., Campbell Soup Co. and Sterling Drug—are conducting internal investigations to determine whether there may have been questionable or illegal dealings with the Memphis-based media services company.

The probes come in the wake of widespread publicity following a Federal Bureau of Investigation seizure of documents from Tanner Co. offices and investigation of allegations of possible tax fraud by company chairman William Tanner (AA, Aug. 15).

Meanwhile, Mr. Tanner sharply denies any wrongdoing, charging that he is being "crucified" by critics out to destroy him for competitive reasons. "These are the biggest lies in the world and we are going to prove it very shortly," Mr. Tanner said during a lengthy telephone interview.

Media General, the Richmond-based company that bought Tanner last year, has started its own investigation of the charges and, in a statement issued last week, said that "thus far we have found nothing to substantiate any of the material allegations by these informants."

The statement was made prior to Media General being granted access to the seized documents. The company was given access to the files late last week, and it reportedly now is poring over the material.

No charges have been filed against either Mr. Tanner or the Tanner company. An FBI affidavit citing allegations of three unnamed sources has been filed in U.S. district court in Memphis as the basis for obtain-

Exec exit at McDonald's

By SCOTT HUME

Another of the links between McDonald's and its national advertising agency, Leo Burnett USA, has been broken amid continually mounting reports that the business relationship between the two is becoming strained.

Stanley Nicpon has been removed from his post as McDonald's assistant vp and director of field marketing. His new title is regional manager trainee, which a spokesman explained means he is in a program "preparing him to be a regional manager" for McDonald's.

His departure from that key marketing post means three of Big Mac's top five marketing executives have left the company or the department in the past year.

The three who have departed were the pivot men at the center of McDonald's marketing triangle, doing the delicate job of coordinating advertising and promotion activities among the company, its 1,500 franchise operators and its agencies. All three were Burnett staffers at a point in their careers.

Roy Bergold, assistant vp-advertising, renewed those ties when he left McDonald's this summer to become a creative director at Burnett, although his announced first destination had been Needham, Harper & Steers/USA.

The change gave rise to speculation Burnett had countered with an offer of a higher-ranking post and more money to keep Mr. Ber-

Ad directors dance to music video beat

By BOB MARICH

When music superstar Michael Jackson chose a director for his lavish music video, Bob Giraldi didn't get the job because of his tv commercials on behalf of Broadway musicals.

Rather, Mr. Giraldi's tv commercial for WABC-TV's "Eyewitness News"—recreating a human interest story about a blind, elderly couple who throw a block party in their racially changing neighborhood—was the clincher. "Michael told me later that one really impressed him because it was so powerfully emotional," Mr. Giraldi said.

Music videos are dramatizations by recording artists of their songs, and they hit the U.S. about the same time the similarly styled "new wave" trend invaded the advertising world. They air on cable's MTV: Music Television and a host of broadcast shows, and they're selling records.

Record companies and artists are going all out to produce slick, flashy music video. And record labels are tapping the directors of Madison Avenue's commercials to apply their talents to the three-to-four minute forms. The movement is going the other way, too.

Big spending planned for painkillers

By RICHARD L. GORDON

WASHINGTON—Upjohn Co. and American Home Products have won unanimous support from a Food & Drug Administration advisory panel to begin over-the-counter marketing of a new pain reliever certain to challenge existing aspirin and nonaspirin brands.

The drug, ibuprofen, is familiar to countless arthritis sufferers in its prescription-dosage form. It has been sold in the U.S. as a prescription drug since 1974.

Though AHP stole center stage by being the first to announce its product, called Advil, and the ad agency assigned to promote it, Young & Rubicam (AA, July 25), Upjohn broke its silence last week to unveil its entry, named Nuprin. The Kalamazoo, Mich., company also disclosed that Grey Advertising is under instructions to have a national introductory campaign ready to go by Oct. 1.

The agency has been working secretly on the product since last January.

Upjohn exec vp Lawrence Hoff said it will match AHP's ad spending levels, because "we have to." He would not be surprised if both companies supported introduction of their respective brands with budgets of $2 million to $3 million a month. He declined to discuss ad themes or pricing for Nuprin.

FDA approval could be several months away, raising doubts the products will be a factor in the 1983-84 cold/flu season. Among the unresolved questions for FDA were the advisory panel's concerns that advertising might persuade prescription users of ibuprofen to switch to the less potent otc variety. Under pressure from the panel, FDA will require consultations just short of preclearance for Upjohn and AHP advertising.

Solid support from the panel is a big plus for quick action. Just months ago, a different advisory group challenged FDA for switching a prescription asthma ingredient to otc status without getting panel approval. FDA countermanded its first decision and recalled the product, Alupent, from otc sale.

Prescription ibuprofen has been an enormous marketing success for Upjohn, which sells the drug under the Motrin brand name. The Nuprin otc version is formulated at reduced strength of 200mgs. and would be sold in film-covered tablets. Mr. Hoff said manufacturing of Nuprin tablets is already under way at plants in Puerto Rico. AHP has not disclosed manufacturing plans.

New frozen foods shape up

By JANET NEIMAN

The retail freezer case, once the domain of pot pies and tv dinners, will become distinctly tonier this fall with the introduction of a new wave of low-calorie, high-quality, high-price entree lines.

Concurrent introductions from such food companies as Pillsbury, General Mills, ConAgra, Campbell Soup and Van de Kamp's are responses to the success of Stouffer Corp.'s Lean Cuisine line, introduced nationally almost two years ago.

The established expertise and consumer recognition enjoyed by many of these marketers are certain to test the strength of Lean Cuisine's franchise.

Pillsbury Co. is moving to fight the stagnation its Green Giant unit has faced in the $1.5 billion frozen entree market. The Minneapolis company is entering 22 markets with a new line of Green Giant StirFry entrees, said to be the first such entree item.

The six Chinese-style dishes—including shrimp, beef and chicken—with 230 to 340 calories, will be introduced soon as the initial phase of a national introduction.

The line, ranging from $1.99 to $2.49 at retail, is packaged in a gold box, which eventually will be used for all the Green Giant entrees.

Pillsbury earlier moved to a lighter positioning of its Green Giant entrees by flagging 12 items with calorie counts. These are being shipped nationally (AA, Jan. 31).

Stouffer's Lean Cuisine line has variety going for it: Items range from Italian pasta to Chinese beef to fish. But some marketers will try to loosen Stouffer's grasp by using their strengths in specific, es-

Nets dash, splash for fall tv series

By DIANE MERMIGAS

The network scramble for prime time ratings has begun, with NBC offering the greatest number of advanced series previews and original specials before the official Sept. 26 start of the tv season.

Of its 10 new series, third-place NBC will offer early premieres of four: "We've Got it Made" Sept. 8; the radically revamped news magazine "First Camera," originally titled "Monitor," Sept. 18, and "Mr. Smith" and "For Love and Honor" Sept. 23. The latter are two of the four new series comprising NBC's overhauled Friday lineup.

NBC also will stage a live three-hour entertainment special during premiere week as a vehicle to promote its new schedule. The $3 million, name-talent extravaganza will air for one hour nightly Sept. 27, 28 and 29. NBC will announce the special and details at a press conference Wednesday.

Other NBC preseason big events that will offer promotional opportunities include the Miss America pageant Sept. 17, a Bob Hope comedy salute Sept. 19 and the live Emmy Awards telecast Sept. 25.

"Mr. Smith," about a talking orangutan with an IQ of 256 who is a consultant to the U.S. military, will have the most unusual new series advance in a promotional campaign that begins this week.

The promos designed by Steve Sohmer, senior vp of NBC Entertainment, will urge viewers to dial a toll-free telephone number to hear taped messages of Mr. Smith discussing issues of the day.

NBC also will offer preseason unveilings of such returning series as "Real People" with a 90-minute special Sept. 14; "The A Team" and a special two-hour "Remington Steele" Sept. 20, and "The Facts of Life" Sept. 21.

ABC last week announced the early launch of two new series and two returning series. Sources say other advance previews are likely.

Pabst, Oly to get light extensions

By ROBERT REED

Pabst Brewing Co. will add two more light beers to its burgeoning product roster this fall by introducing companions to its flagship Pabst Blue Ribbon and Olympia brands.

Additionally, Pabst is considering the development of a new superpremium brew to take the place of Andeker, which is being repositioned in many markets at the lower end of the segment, the company said.

The Milwaukee brewer is hoping the new light beers will capitalize on the name recognition of Pabst and Olympia. "It is basically a line extension that will play on the strength of the existing brands," says Richard Ratcheson, vp-advertising.

This fall Pabst Light will be introduced into 30% of the country, mainly in the upper Midwest—a stronghold for Blue Ribbon. Olympia Light will premiere in the 11 western states where its regular counterpart is most popular.

It is Pabst Light that is earmarked for national distribution next year. That move apparently substitutes for the brewer's plan to make Jacob Best Premium Light

Sales Promotion

Stepping into a new era

By B.G. Yovovich

Who would have thought that prosaic, mundane sales promotions—the cents-off coupons, the bonus packs, the free samples, the games, the contests and sweepstakes—would ever steal the limelight from Madison Avenue's more glamorous advertising tools? Or that the seemingly innocuous sales techniques would be seen as portending profound changes in the modern advertising world?

As hard to believe as such claims may have been just a few years ago, a variety of statistics underscores the breadth of the changes that have taken place in the sales promotion industry and in its relationship to the advertising community. For example, industry sources estimate that close to 120 billion coupons (or about 1,400 per U.S. household) were distributed last year, more than five times the number distributed a decade ago. The number of sweepstakes and the dollar value of their prizes also have shot up in recent years, both figures having roughly tripled since 1975.

Studies also suggest that, in numerous product categories, the proportion of the total marketing budget (advertising plus promotion) devoted to sales promotion efforts now tops 60%—compared with less than 40% in the late 1960s. More generally, figures indicate that since the mid-1970s sales promotion budgets have been growing at a 12% clip, compared with a 9% growth rate for ad budgets.

Industry observers also maintain that the rising budgets are spurring increased sophistication within the sales promotion community and have helped raise the prestige of sales promotion in the business community. In fact, some sales promotion enthusiasts argue that the rise has only just begun.

"Promotion is the marketing strategy of the 1980s," says Marvin L. Cotlar, president of Hanley Partnership sales promotion companies. "Just as product invention, positioning and segmentation, and image were the marketing strategies of the past forty years, promotion is the strategy for today, at least, the balance of the decade."

And yet, at the same time that rosy predictions like Mr. Cotlar's are being heard, other experts are pointing out that the sales promotion industry is beginning to encounter problems and that some potential barriers to further growth are beginning to emerge. Recent studies, for example, suggest that coupon clutter is becoming a significant problem, and there is growing evidence that the use of promotions is beginning to decline in some of the business segments that have been heaviest users of the sales techniques.

Any effort to explore the future of the sales promotion industry must closely examine the underlying factors that have spurred its growth. While the faltering economy of recent years can be credited with having caused greater consumer price-sensitivity and having nudged marketers into using such things as rebates and sweepstakes as "price-cut surrogates," there also has been a more fundamental factor behind the sales promotion boom: U.S. companies' increased emphasis on growth through the introduction of new, market-segmenting goods and services.

"The proliferation of brands [during the last decade] has helped lead to the proliferation of promotions," explains Thomas Nagle, a University of Chicago professor whose research has focused on promotions.

"There is nothing more important to a new product than trial. You can have the best product in the world, but, until someone tries it, they don't know it is good.

"Whenever you bring out a new product, it really makes sense to use promotions, to do whatever you have to do in order to buy trial."

This argument is supported by statistics that show that the greatest growth in the use of sales promotions has occurred in precisely those areas in which new product growth has been the greatest during the last decade: Food products and consumer package goods. Moreover, in many cases, promotions instituted by new brands prompted established brands to retaliate with promotional efforts of their own matching coupon efforts with coupons or trade promotions with trade promotions.

As the sales promotion battles have escalated, however, doubts have begun to emerge about the wisdom of such head-to-head confrontations.

"The established brand is going to be sitting with a lot of consumers who will be relatively loyal," says Mr. Nagle, "and there is only a subset of the regular consumers who are actually going to use the deal that the new brand is offering. Say that number is 25%. That means that 75% would continue to buy the established brand and not tumble.

Retailers benefit from coupons, as well. According to a confidential study by National In-Store Marketing, which packages a co-op couponing progam in egg cartons, weekly warehouse-to-store movements of major supermarket chains show substantial increases.

For example, average case sales of a dry cereal couponed in egg cartons climbed from 91.6 to 113 per week, up 23%, for a 10-week period.

For a paper towel, movement increased 592% from 67 cases to 1,131 cases over a 10-week period.

Both manufacturers and retailers have not had this data on the effect of coupons before. According to Nielsen, "Knowledge of the effect of promotions on the sale of specific items is meager and imperfect."

According to In-Store Marketing, this data can dramatize for manufacturers and retailers the effectiveness of short duration promotion almost on a real time basis by showing a complete inventory count on a week-to-week basis.

For both manufacturer and retailer, the coupons can serve as a traffic builder and an incentive to read both manufacturers and retailers ads. If, as is suggested, 59% of all consumers actively look for coupons, they read 50% or more of an ad with a coupon, according to the Newspaper Advertising Bureau. ■ use the deal that the new brand is offering.

"Unfortunately, the brand manager of the established brand doesn't know which of the customers are loyal and which are subject to being induced to try the other brand, so he has to come out with the discount to all the buyers."

Such growing reservations about couponing may be responsible for some of the recent shifts by marketers of established brands toward sweepstakes, games and contests. As Mr. Cotlar notes, "The cost of running a contest or sweepstakes is virtually fixed regardless of how much you sell."

As product proliferation efforts move into new categories, it seems likely that increased use of promotion will follow.

The coupon glut also has spurred companies to generate that all-important first trial through promotional alternatives.

"One of the more interesting developments is the merging of sampling with the trend toward the use of special events," says Mr. Cotlar. "You can assume that people are going to have a good time at the special event, and that, if you sample your product at the special event, they will associate the good time they have with your product."

Marketers also are becoming concerned about the long-term effects of heavy promotional activity.

"One of the things that is starting to become a problem is that media costs are skyrocketing and are starting to knock out the smaller brands [out of media advertising] and causing these brands to devote almost their entire marketing budget to promotional expenditures," says Robert Evans, director-promotional services at Gillette Co. and chairman of the PMAA. "As a result, they are not building the brand identity that they might have in the past, and the question being raised frequently is, 'Does the consumer really know who you are or are they buying the brand that is being promoted this week?' "

"One of the great hazards is that you will generate a growing group of consumers that are deal-conscious and that you will destroy the price structure of the product," says Don Schultz, a marketing consultant and advertising professor at Northwestern University. "A lot of the information that is coming out of the scanner studies looks like you have a large number of people who buy only when there is some kind of featured price or when there is some kind of promotional activity."

In Mr. Schultz' view, bar soaps already are suffering from too much promotion. "It has become extremely difficult to sell bar soaps at the regular price," he says. "The consumer doesn't really know what the value of the bar of soap is.

"Or look at the soft drink business. The greatest volume of soft drinks is sold on the weekend in supermarkets when there is a feature. By emphasizing promotions, marketers are building a market of people who don't care if it is Dr Pepper, 7UP or Coke. All they care is that it's $1.09. You end up destroying the brand franchise that way."

In some product areas, particularly the package goods categories that were among the first to embrace promotions, there

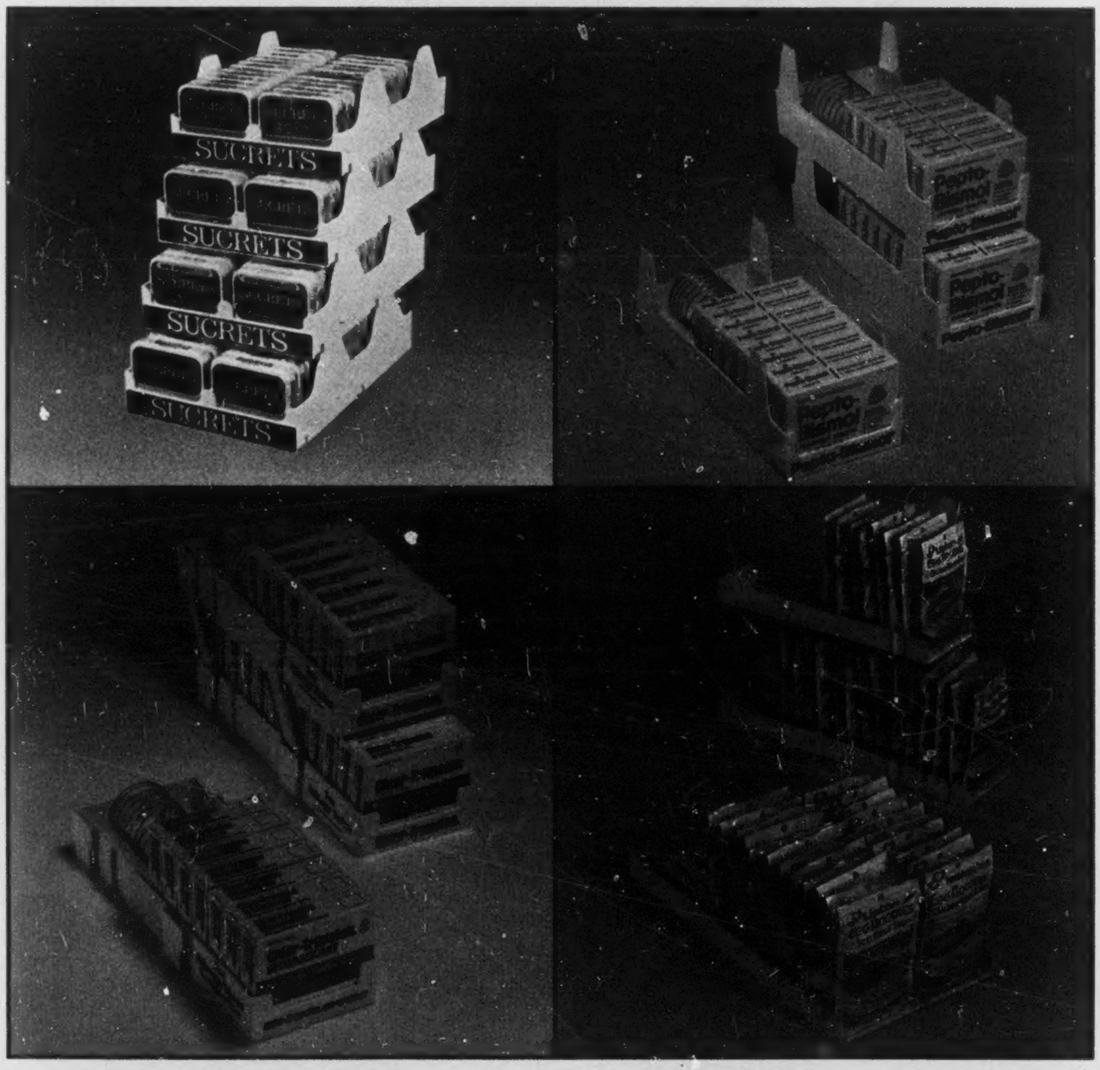
Our spring load displays can really push your product.



Some packaging, while working perfectly for the product, doesn't stand up for itself on the store shelves. When that happens to your products it's time to back them up with a Henschel-Steinau spring loaded display.

We make spring loads in so many different sizes and formats that we can, more than likely, tailor a unit for your product or products without the high cost of custom design or the expense of special tooling and production runs. By utilizing one of our stock spring loads, and selecting from a wide variety of materials, a selection of colors and our extensive custom graphic capability, we can create POP displays and selling units as attractive, as highly visible and as effective as those pictured above.

The next time you catch one or more of your products lying down on the job, call us at Henschel-Steinau. With our spring loaded stock display units we'll come up with an easy to set up, economical and extremely workable solution that will give them the push they need to start walking out of the store.

New era

are indications that their use may have peaked. On the other hand, as market segmentation strategies and product proliferation efforts move into new business categories, it seems likely that increased use of sales promotion tactics will follow.

"The industries that are using them most intensely now realize that they have gone overboard and are now trying to cut back," says Mr. Nagle, "but that is going to be more than made up for by the expansion of sales promotion techniques into industries that have never used them before, like financial services, the airline industry and alcoholic beverages."

Many experts pick the service sector as a major area of sales promotion growth. "With the deregulation of the airlines and financial services there is a whole new competitive environment, and they have had to focus more attention on marketing," observes Roger Strang, a New York University professor who has studied sales promotions. Because fixed operating costs and "disappearing inventory" characterize most service industries, "they also are particularly concerned with the problem of trying to manage demand. This is where sales promotion is an outstandingly effective tool because of its ability to spur quick responses.

"My sense is that in recent years the importance of sales promotion has remained pretty steady in the sophisticated companies—that is, the top package goods companies—but that the real growth in recent years has come from new companies and new industries that are adopting sales promotion techniques as much more important parts of their marketing strategies."

Though the food and package goods industries may not increase their use of promotions, increases in the level of sophistication of their use of the techniques are likely to occur.

"There is much more money spent on sales promotion research now than has ever been spent in the past," says Mr. Strang. "One estimate is that sales of scanner data have reached $25 million. Not all of that is for sales promotion [research], but a good portion of it is, and it is providing a lot more and better information" than had been available to food and package goods marketers.

In particular, one of the biggest problems in analyzing sales promotion programs has been that "It's a tough tracking problem," points out Robert Blattenberg, a University of Chicago professor who has developed a computer model to evaluate sales promotions. With couponing, for example, "you can measure how many coupons are redeemed, but it's very hard to analyze what real impact you've had. You don't know if the coupons have led to increased sales or just deferred sales. You don't know if you are getting purchases from an existing user or a new user. "Using the scanners with [consumer] diaries, it may be possible to identify how sales promotions are actually changing consumer behavior."

More generally, adds Mr. Strang of NYU, such new tools are combining with the experience marketers have garnered over the last decade and is giving them "a better understanding of the role of sales promotion and how it fits in with their over-all marketing strategy. There is a better sense of some of the things that sales promotions can do, as well as some of the things it can't."
